ond, third, and fourth high-service areas in commission, the demand for water on the tunnel under the city and the existing filtration plant will be reduced about 50 per cent. This condition will permit unwatering the tunnel and the making of repairs therein. Once the deterioration in the old works caused by their long service has been made good, they can be operated until the safe operating capacity of the combined old and new works has been reached.

The extent of repairs and estimated cost for such work are as follows:

Repairs to intake at Great Falls	$10,000
Repairs to gatehouse at Great Falls	10,000
Lining unlined sections of tunnels	60,000
Repairing lining of conduit	30,000
Repairing lining by-conduit at Dalecarlia Reservoir	27,000
New gate in Dalecarlia sluice tower	2,000
New gate at wasteweir No. 3	2,000
Repairing lining in tunnel	115,000
Three new air shafts in tunnel	11,000
New pumps and repairing machinery at Rock Creek station	21,000
New stack at Rock Creek station	2,000
New stack at Champlain Avenue pumping station	2,000
Repairing machinery at Champlain Avenue pumping station	4,000
New stack at East Shaft pumping station	2,000
Repairing machinery at East Shaft pumping station	4,000
Total	302,000

16. The locations shown on the drawings for the power station at the new filtration plant, the first and second high-service reservoirs, and pipe lines are the best from an engineering standpoint. Should undue difficulty or expense be encountered in acquiring the lands at any of these points, some modification of design of the corresponding structure to more economically fit such conditions may become desirable. The lands required for reservoir sites are so located that they are rapidly appreciating in value. They should, therefore, be acquired promptly. Some of the lands through which tunnel rights near Great Falls are required are in disputed ownership. It is evident that to await the results of efforts to settle questions of title or obtain title by condemnation will greatly delay the completion of the conduit, and similar delays may be experienced in acquiring sites for reservoirs and pipe lines. Congress, recognizing similar conditions as the cause of undue and expensive delays in the construction of urgently needed public works, has in the past enacted legislation which permitted construction to proceed while at the same time protecting the interests of the owners of property taken. The following is quoted from existing law:

Congress enacted the following (chap. 294, Supplement to the Rev. Stats., vol. 1) in providing for the construction of the extension to McMillan Park of the original Aqueduct:

"When the map and survey are completed the Attorney General shall proceed to ascertain the owners or claimants of the premises embraced in the survey, and shall cause to be published for the space of 30 days in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia a description of the entire tract or tracts of land embraced in the survey, with a notice that the same has been taken for the uses mentioned in this act, and notifying all claimants to any portion of said premises to file, within its period of publication, in the Department of Justice a description of the tract or parcel claimed, and a statement of its value as estimated by the claimant."

* * * * * * *

"Upon the publication of the notice as above directed the Secretary of War may take possession of the premises embraced in the survey and map and proceed with the construction herein authorized; and upon payment being made therefor, or, without payment, upon the expiration of the times above limited without the filing of a petition, an absolute title to the premises shall vest in the United States."

The river and harbor act of July 18, 1918 (40 Stats. 911), contained this provision:

"SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of War, in pursuance of authority conferred on him by law, causes proceedings to be instituted in the name of the United States for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, easements, or rights of way needed for a work of river and harbor improvement duly authorized by Congress, the United States, upon the filing of the petition in any such proceedings, shall have the right to take immediate possession of said lands, easements, or rights of way, to the extent of the interest to be acquired, and proceed with such public works thereon as have been authorized by Congress: Provided, That certain and adequate provision shall have been made for the payment of just compensation to the party or parties entitled thereto, either by previous appropriation by the United States or by the deposit of moneys or other form of security in such amount and form as shall be approved by the court in which such proceedings shall be instituted. The respondent or respondents may move at any time in the court to increase or change the amounts or securities, and the court shall make such order as shall be just in the premises and as shall adequately protect the respondents. In every case the proceedings in condemnation shall be diligently prosecuted on the part of the United States in order that such compensation may be promptly ascertained and paid."

In the District of Columbia appropriation act of July 11, 1919 (41 Stats. 100):

"Provided, That whenever the Secretary of War, in pursuance of authority conferred on him by law, causes proceedings to be instituted for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, easements, or rights of way needed for the said work, the United States, upon the filing of the petition in any such proceedings, shall have the right to take immediate possession of said lands, easements, or rights of way to the extent of the interest to be acquired and to proceed with such public works thereon as have been authorized by Congress: Provided further, That certain adequate provisions shall have been made for the payment of just compensation to the party or parties entitled thereto, either by previous appropriation by the United States or by the deposit of moneys or other form of security in such amount and form as shall be approved by the court in which such proceedings shall be instituted. The respondent or respondents may move at any time in the court to increase or change the amounts or securities, and the court shall make such order as shall be just in the premises and as shall adequately protect the respondents. In every case the proceedings in condemnation shall be diligently prosecuted on the part of the United States in order that such compensation may be promptly ascertained and paid."

In order that the completion of the new works may not be unduly delayed it is strongly recommended that there be enacted into law a provision permitting the Secretary of War to take possession of property required for the construction of such works upon the filing of a suit in condemnation.

17. Estimates of cost of works within the District of Columbia filtration plant:

Mr. BRIGGS. Has the gentleman answered the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin as to how long it will probably be?

Mr. EVANS. I am trying to come to that. The project also includes another filtration plant similar to the one that is now used for the purpose of purifying the water—settling it—a purification of it that will be placed at about the District line at a point near that of the Dalecarlia Reservoir. The two parts of projects which require the greater length of time are the construction of this conduit and the filtration plant. It is stated that it can be completed in three years, and at the present rate of appropriation it will probably take about five years. I think now I have answered the questions which the two gentlemen put, unless there is something else——

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield further——

Mr. EVANS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does this project in any wise include the taking of any rights of way of the Chesapeake & Potomac Canal which have become moribund and obsolete?

Mr. EVANS. My understanding is that it runs under the canal by a tunnel. Now, it is, of course, as the gentleman understands quite well, an easement, and there is a matter of value, and it will have to be settled by contract or condemnation; and that calls to mind the question, perhaps, which the gentleman really has in mind, which is that at the time the original conduit was constructed there was a dispute between certain landowners and the Government, and a certain amount of money under condemnation proceedings was appropriated but has never been accepted by the owners, although all rights of appeal have lapsed.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I ask that the gentleman have two additional minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield the gentleman one minute. I have an agreement to get out of the way——

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstance, which is very important, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-eight Members are present. A quorum is present.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW, 11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKERS PRO TEMPORE TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will designate to act as Speaker pro tempore to-morrow in the memorial exercises for the late Senator WATSON of Georgia, his colleague, Mr. LEE of Georgia, and for the memorial exercises for the late Representative BRINSON, of North Carolina, Mr. STEDMAN, of North Carolina.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, for to-day, on account of illness;

To Mr. REED of New York, indefinitely, on account of death in the family; and

To Mr. ROGERS, for three days, on account of illness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 10 and 25 to the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes disagreed by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon and had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 38.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes, to correct an error therein.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13696. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up the conference report on the legislative bill. The Clerk will report it.

The conference report and accompanying statement were read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and agree to the same.

The committee on conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 10, 25, and 26.

J. G. CANNON,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
REED SMOOT,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

On Nos. 1 to 9 and 11 to 17, inclusive, relating to the Senate: Appropriates for the officers and employees of the Senate in the numbers and amounts as proposed in the Senate amendments and makes the appropriation for the maintenance of the Vice President's automobile "immediately available."

On No. 18: Provides, as proposed by the Senate, that the statement of appropriations shall include the third and fourth sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

On No. 19: Appropriates $31,385, as proposed by the Senate, for special repairs to the Senate Chamber.

On No. 20: Appropriates $55,370, as proposed by the Senate, for painting and renovating the Senate Office Building.

On No. 21: Appropriates $16,180, as proposed by the Senate, for storeroom cages on the attic floor of the Senate Office Building.

On Nos. 22, 23, and 24, relating to the Library of Congress Building: Provides for the compensation of a clerk at $2,250, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,000, as proposed by the House, and makes the compensation of two attendants in ladies' room $720 each, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $480, as proposed by the House.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon the following amendments of the Senate:

On No. 10: Relating to the appointment of clerks to Senators.

On No. 25: Providing for a disbursing clerk for the Government Printing Office.

On No. 26: Authorizing the employment of apprentices in the Government Printing Office in excess of 25 at any one time.

J. G. CANNON,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves the adoption of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 10: On page 6, after line 12, insert: "Senators elected, whose term of office begins on the 4th day of March, and whose credentials in due form of law shall have been presented to the Senate, or filed with the Secretary thereof, are authorized to appoint the same number of clerical assistants, not to exceed four, at the same annual salaries, to which qualified Senators not chairmen of committees are entitled, whose compensation shall be paid out of the appropriation for clerical assistance to Senators."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment. This amendment relates to the clerical force of the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have this amendment reported?

Mr. ANDERSON. It has been reported. This amendment relates, I say, to the clerical force in the Senate. Under the present practice of the Senate a newly elected Senator gets as clerical assistance only the secretary provided by law. The effect of this amendment is to give to a newly elected and incoming Senator the same clerical force on March 4 that he would be entitled to on the 1st of December, at the beginning of the regular session. This amendment is obviously in accordance with the principle of equality between incoming and existing Senators, and we thought it would be proper to adopt it. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 25, page 24, line 23, after the semicolon, strike out the words "cashier and paymaster, $2,500," and insert in lieu thereof "disbursing clerk, $2,500: Provided, That the disbursing clerk of the Government Printing Office hereafter shall be charged with the receipt and disbursement of all moneys for said office in accordance with the provisions of the law relating to the Public Printer and other disbursing officers of the Government, under such bond and rules as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; and thereafter the Public Printer shall give a bond in the sum of $25,000 for the faithful performance of his duties."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, under the existing law the Public Printer is the disbursing officer of the Government Printing Office. As such disbursing officer he has to give a bond of $100,000. The Government Printing Office is the only department of the Government where the head of a department or of the service is also the disbursing officer. The existing situation is the occasion of a great deal of inconvenience on the part of the Public Printer, and in order to bring this part of the Government service into conformity with the situation in other departments of the Government this amendment provides that the existing cashier and paymaster shall be the disbursing officer and shall give such bond as may be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, and thereafter the Public Printer shall give a bond in the sum of $25,000. I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 26: On page 35, line 18, after the figures "$128,810" insert "The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to recede and concur with an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDERSON moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 26 with the following amendment: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices, not to exceed 200 at any one time, as will in his judgment be consistent with the economical service of the office."

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I make a preferential motion. I move, Mr. Speaker, to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Printing Committee of the House I am acting in accordance with the wishes and instructions of our committee in making this preferential motion. We believe that there is no necessity for limiting the number of apprentices to 200. The Joint Committee on Printing, as well as the House Committee on Printing, and, I might add, the Senate Committee on Printing, are unanimous on this point and favor concurring in the Senate amendment. In evidence of our belief that there is no necessity for the amendment limiting the apprentices to 200, I want to call the attention of the House to section 49 of the act of January 12, 1895, which is the general printing law:

The Public Printer may employ, at such rates of wages as he may deem for the interest of the Government and just to the persons employed, such proof readers, laborers, and other hands as may be necessary for the execution of the orders for public printing and binding authorized by law; but he shall not, at any time, employ in the office more hands than the absolute necessities of the public work may require.

I also want to call attention to the authority given the Joint Committee on Printing in the legislative appropriation act for 1920, approved March 1, 1919:

That the Joint Committee on Printing shall have power to adopt and employ such measures as, in its discretion, may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect, delay, duplication, or waste in the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the existing law which I have quoted will take care of the matter of apprentices and there is no danger of too many being employed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statement has been made to me that the expenditure for apprentices in the printing department of the Government was a useless expenditure because they were not needed; that the printing concerns all over the country were not employing apprentices in any great numbers, but they desired the Government to expend the money for apprentices so as to educate them in the trade, and as soon as they were educated they would take them away from the Government and employ them.

Mr. KIESS. I think that this statement is not correct. We are supposed to have the best printing establishment in the world, and I think it is only fair that the Government should train its proportionate share of apprentices.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On the other hand, if the statement made to me is true, that apprentices are not generally employed in private establishments, but that they looked to the Government to make the expenditure it would be equally unfair for the Government to train them all.

Mr. KIESS. That is not true; and it has been proven that the training of apprentices is a good thing at the Government Printing Office. It has been unfortunate that under an act of Congress passed in 1895 the Public Printer has been limited to 25 apprentices in an establishment with over 4,000 employees. I am glad to say that the Public Printer has started in to train apprentices, and we now have the full limit of 25. The reason that the amendment was placed in the bill in the Senate was to give the Public Printer an opportunity to more economically carry on the business of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIESS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesee. I want to ask the gentleman whether he will say that private concerns are employing in a considerable number apprentices in the printing business?

Mr. KIESS. I do know that private concerns are employing apprentices, perhaps not as many as in times past, but that will apply not only to the printing trade but other trades. Apprentices are not as plentiful as in years past. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the hearings before the Committee on Printing we brought out the fact that there could be no reasonable objection to increasing the number of apprentices in the Government Printing Office.

Not only on account of the shortage of labor in various trades, but also to obtain employees properly trained in the special requirements of the Government service, is it highly essential that the Government Printing Office resume at this time the work of training many of its own skilled workers and continue without let or hindrance this most important duty to itself and to the printing industry of the United States.

On the recommendation of the Public Printer, the Civil Service Commission has agreed that any person entitled to preference because of military or naval service may be appointed an apprentice without regard to the 20-year maximum age limit. This will afford an opportunity for the rehabilitation training of many war veterans if the restriction to 25 apprentices now imposed by law is removed without further delay.

It is important, therefore, that the apprentice limitation be repealed by Congress at the present session, so that the Government Printing Office can begin at once more extensive training of veterans who may desire to earn a good and comfortable livelihood as thoroughly competent craftsmen.

As the Government Printing Office is unquestionably the best equipped and most suitable place in the United States for training in the various branches of the allied printing trades, it is regrettable that this wonderful opportunity is now denied by law to all but a few of the young men who so heroically offered their lives in defense of the Nation which maintains this big establishment. Their training can be carried on without the expenditure of a single additional dollar save for the compensation of the veterans who desire better to fit themselves for the continued service of their country. If for no other reason, the vocational training of disabled veterans alone will fully justify the extension of the apprenticeship system to meet their special needs.

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the reason there are few apprentices in private business is because of a union rule that the unions enforce in these private businesses that prevents them from employing apprentices at will—the same influence that has made Congress limit by law the number of apprentices to 25 in a four-year period in the Government Printing Office.

In every open shop in the United States to-day employing printers, without any exception at all—and by open shop I mean the kind of shop that employs a printer for what he can do regardless of whether he does or does not belong to a union—in every open shop at least 33⅓ per cent of the employees are apprentices. And the employers are not limited, restricted, or dictated to as to the number of apprentices they employ.

In all of what is called closed shops, where they will not permit you to employ any but union laborers, they have none—no apprentices or a very limited few. Will the gentleman tell us what is the average age of our 4,000 employees the Government now has down at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. KIESS. I could not tell.

Mr. BLANTON. I have understood that it is 42. I may be mistaken, but I have been told so.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very important subject, and that we ought to have a quorum here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventeen Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, resuming where I left off when the roll was called, I want to be fair upon this question. I understand, for instance, that the unions do allow a few apprentices. Take my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTERS], for instance. He has 103 union employees in his printing establishment, and he has four apprentices out of the 103 employees. Take the bricklayers in Chicago. They allow each Chicago contractor to have one apprentice a year. For instance, if the contractor is employing 50, or 500, or 1,000 bricklayers on one or many big jobs he can have one apprentice a year and one only. The unions permit the Government to have 25 apprentices in the Printing Office in a four-year period. I have evidence in my office, given me in writing by employees in the Government Printing Office, that there are employees there now doing work that apprentices could do and receiving the pay of journeymen printers for doing it; and that no matter how capable and proficient such employees become, or how well qualified they are to do the work of journeymen printers, they can never be promoted to that position because union rules will not permit it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I have not the time. If I had, I would be very glad to yield. Where we have 4,000 employees in the Government Printing Office, why should we not have as many apprentices as the Public Printer can use to the advantage of the Government? That is all this amendment provides. Let me quote it exactly:

The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office.

Why should the Public Printer not employ as many apprentices as he thinks is to the best interest of the Government? Why should he not be allowed to do that? The unions do not want him to do it. The law limits him to 25. Is there any reason that you can give to your judgment and conscience against that proposition? That is all the Government is trying to do here. Why limit it to 200? If among the 4,000 employees the Government can use 400 or 1,000 apprentices, why limit the number to 200? Oh, gentlemen, it is merely a union proposition. You can not get away from it. If limiting the number to only 200 had good sense in it, I would be for it. I am for union propositions when they are based on good sense, but when they are ridiculous I am against them. I am for many of the propositions that my good friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] stands for, and I tell you if they were all like him they would not be far wrong——

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman know how many printers they have in the Government Printing Office?

Mr. BLANTON. Four thousand employees there.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. For years they have had 25 apprentices, and the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] gives them 200. Does the gentleman not think that is a pretty good increase?

Mr. BLANTON. Why limit the number to 200? It is a union proposition. The Government should not have its hands tied.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And does the gentleman not think that union men have the right to protect themselves or try to do so in a lawful way as far as they can do so?

Mr. BLANTON. Let me tell my good friend from Ohio that I am not in favor of unions protecting themselves by laws that benefit only their 4,000,000 union members to the detriment of the 107,000,000 people of the United States. I am for the whole people. There is not a man here who thinks more of him than I do——

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Oh, answer the question.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do that to benefit 4,000 men to the detriment of the interest of 107,000,000 people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the proposition that I am for. I am for the interest of the whole people as against the interest of a few.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not reported the roll call yet. Two hundred and nine Members have answered to the call, not a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 104.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fourteen members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this amendment placed in this bill by the Senate merely gives the Public Printer the right to employ such number of apprentices as, in his judgment, will be consistent with the economical service of the office. The law regulating the Government Printing Office provides that he can not employ any more than necessary for the economical administration of his office in any department, and then the law gives the Joint Committee on Printing the right to supervise that proposition and require him to put on 15 or 30 or 40 or whatever they see fit. Now, the proposition of the conference committee is to concur with an amendment fixing it at 200, and it is simply an invitation to the Public Printer to appoint 200 and sweep away the power that the Joint Committee on Printing has to limit it to less than that. For instance, we have no idea the present Public Printer would do anything of the kind, but we do not know who will be the Public Printer five years from now, and he might come up and undertake to put 200 in there and the Joint Committee on Printing might say he does not need them. The Printing Committee says, "You can not put in over 50." His reply might come, "The Congress has given me authority to do that and I propose to do it," and that sweeps away all the right of the Committee on Printing to limit it. The whole proposition is just one of leaving it with the Joint Committee on Printing to determine whether he is employing them in a proper and economical way. Now, as to the question of employing apprentices in commercial establishments. The testimony of the Public Printer is that in commercial establishments of the size of the Government Printing Office 200 apprentices would probably be employed, that would be about the per cent, and that is why this limitation of 200 has been put in this proposed amendment. The law as it stands here puts it in the hands and control of the Joint Committee on Printing—and that is not a very extravagant committee, if any of you have had any dealings with it—and the committee is a unit, both the Senate and House committee on the proposal that it ought to be left as the Senate put it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It has been in a way said by the gentleman from Texas that this has been forced upon the committee by the labor union.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know anything about that. We have had no trouble with labor about it. This is a pure matter of business in a great business establishment of the Government, and we want the law left so that there can be no question about the fact that the Joint Committee on Printing can say to this man how many he can employ and if he has too many to tell him to go and get rid of them, if he can.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, the gentleman knows that the law limits the number to 25, and the effect of the amendment put in here cuts out the limit altogether.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know why the limit was put in; I am not responsible for it; but I do tell you this, that an apprentice gets 25 cents an hour and the journeyman printer, whose place the apprentice is supposed to take, gets 85 cents an hour, and it might be economical to have more apprentices or it might not be, according to the efficiency of the men.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. MAPES. If the amendment proposed by the chairman of the subcommittee on the legislative bill limiting the number to 200 should be adopted, would the Committee on Printing then have authority to control the Public Printer within the 200 limit?

Mr. STEVENSON. This is a later law, and the proposition is that they give him the right to employ as many as 200, and he can say to the joint committee that Congress has amended the law and said that he could employ 200, which would sweep away the power to control him within the 200. That is the construction I put upon it. That is all I want to say about it, and the committee is a unit on both sides, and it is not in the interest of union labor or in the interest of nonunion labor, but it is in the interest of the economical administration of this great industry that we have reached this conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the whole question involved in the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the motion I have made is whether the Public Printer shall have unlimited authority to appoint as many apprentices as he deems proper, subject to the approval of the Committee on Printing, or whether the number of apprentices shall be limited to 200, as proposed by the amendment I have offered.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves a call of the House.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under the order previously made, until to-morrow, Sunday, February 11, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

973. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,154 required by the United States Coast Guard, Treasury Department, for payment of damages caused by collisions with Coast Guard vessels (H. Doc. No. 563); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

974. A letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the Commissioner of Patents for the calendar year 1922; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 14287) to authorize the Secretary of State to acquire in Paris a site with an erected building thereon, at a cost not to exceed $300,000, for the use of the diplomatic and consular establishments of the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FULLER: A bill (H. R. 14288) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. HERRICK: A bill (H. R. 14289) prohibiting Members of the United States House of Representatives and Members of the United States Senate from accepting entertainment at the hands of an individual citizen or corporation, or from going upon pleasure trips, commonly called junkets, wherein the expense is borne by a private individual or corporation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: A bill (H. R. 14290) to erect additional buildings to be used as rest camps for convalescents, beneficiaries of the United States Veterans' Bureau; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. ALMON: A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 83) providing for printing additional copies of soil survey of Lauderdale County, Ala.; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. COLTON: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 441) creating a joint commission, to be known as the joint commission of gold and silver inquiry, which shall consist of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. KIESS: A resolution (H. Res. 519) to print as a House document the journal of the fifty-seventh national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic for the use of the House and the Senate; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LINEBERGER: A resolution (H. Res. 520) authorizing the Clerk of the House to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Chlide Nelms and Sherrill B. Osborne one month's salary as clerks to the late Hon. Henry Z. Osborne; to the Committee on Accounts.

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota urging Congress to enact legislation guaranteeing to the wheat grower a minimum price of $1.50 per bushel; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HAWLEY: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon favoring legislation which compels woolen manufacturers to label woolen fabrics by placing a tag on the product plainly stating the exact percentage of virgin wool; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts favoring an embargo being placed on coal; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana requesting Congress to enact such legislation as may be necessary to issue patents to farm units on Federal reclamation projects in order that such farm units may become taxable; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. RAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, urging Congress to submit a constitutional amendment prohibiting the further issuance of tax-exempt securities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YOUNG: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, urging Congress to enact a law to guarantee $1.50 per bushel to the growers of wheat; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SINCLAIR: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, urging that Congress take cognizance of the present unfortunate condition of the wheat farmers of the Northwest and that a price of $1.50 per bushel be set on wheat while this emergency lasts; to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ABERNETHY: A bill (H. R. 14291) providing for the examination and survey of North River, N. C.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. HUMPHREY of Nebraska: A bill (H. R. 14292) granting a pension to S. F. Foster; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 11, 1923.

The House met at 11 a. m., and was called to order by Mr. Lee of Georgia as Speaker pro tempore.

The Rev. Page Milburn offered the following prayer:

Holy Father, Almighty, Eternal God, we the creatures of Thy hand, and the grateful recipients of Thy daily bounty, present our sincere acknowledgment of Thy mercy and protection.

Unworthy as we are of Thy gratuity and too often forgetful of our obligation to Thee, we beseech Thee to continue to bear us up in Thy hands and comfort us with Thy counsel. In prosperity restrain us; in sorrow and calamity comfort and calm us.

May the citizens of this Republic, and more particularly those identified with the making of its laws, be sensible of their obligation to remember Thy commandments to keep them, and to be filled with the spirit of the Son of Man who gave Himself to the uplifting of mankind, and was not unwilling to suffer death, to finish His chosen service.

May the grace of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ be with us all. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the reading of the Journal of yesterday will be deferred. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the special order for the day.

THE LATE SENATOR THOMAS E. WATSON.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to House Resolution 471, Sunday, February 11, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m., is set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of THOMAS E. WATSON, late a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 523.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON, late a Senator from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the House be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, it was with deep regret that we all learned of the death of Senator THOMAS E. WATSON. The sad news was quickly carried over the wires all over the country, and the hearts of his thousands and multiplied thousands of friends and admirers, not only in Georgia, his native State, but in many States of this Union, were saddened. His death was not wholly unexpected by those who were close to him, but his friends generally were not prepared for the early passing of the great American whom they had learned to love and cherish.

In all probability no man in this country had as strong personal following as our late colleague. His friends had for him the strongest admiration and their loyalty and devotion are almost without parallel in this country. His brief service in the United States Senate was not a disappointment to his many friends, but they had hoped for a long and continued service in that great legislative body.

Senator WATSON had a most remarkable career and his trials and vicissitudes, as well as his remarkable successes, were ever apparent from the beginning of his life up to his death. He was born in what was then Columbia, now McDuffy County, Ga., September 5, 1856, and was at the time of his death 66 years of age. His parents, at the time of his birth, lived in a plain log house. They were poor, but honest and good, and on account of their financial conditions they were unable to give him the advantages they so much desired. In their determined efforts they were finally able to give him a good English education at the Steed High School in Thomson, Ga. After he left high school he was employed as a clerk in a general merchandise store in Thomson, and later in a store at Norwood where he received the salary of $5 per week. Later he went to Mercer University, which was in the fall of 1872. This course was at the behest of Professor Steed, who had interested himself in this young student and aided him in entering college. Between terms at the university he taught school in Bibb County, thereby earning enough money to complete the sophomore term.

The panic of 1873 caused the Watson family a great loss in the property they then owned and consequently they faced hard times for several years. However, young WATSON was full of fire and vim, and, acting for himself, he gathered the books which had been given to him by his father and grandfather and sold them to a firm in Augusta, Ga., for a small amount of money but sufficient at that time to pay his expenses into Screven County where he obtained another school, which he taught with signal success and ability. During this trying period a friend gave him a copy of Blackstone and through this avenue he mastered the fundamentals of our system of jurisprudence and wrote his mother that he meant to practice law. His mother remonstrated, because she felt it too big an undertaking for him under the circumstances, but he insisted and was determined to pursue his plans, and paved the way. His old and tried friend, Mr. James Thompson, for whom Mr. WATSON had plowed in the field at 50 cents a day, encouraged him to apply for admission to the bar. This he did, and was admitted to practice in the courts in 1875. He "hung out his shingle," and Mr. Robert H. Pierce, then clerk of the Superior Court, permitted young WATSON to occupy a part of his office until he could establish himself.

It is said of him that his first signal victory in the court room was when he regained for a mother an infant girl child whom she had deeded away to its putative father. Col. Bill Tutt, the then big lawyer of the town and vicinity, prepared the papers deeding the little girl to the supposed father, and before the trial was concluded Colonel Tutt found himself completely routed by the masterful effort and presentation of the case, which was lost to Mr. WATSON, due mainly to his acknowledged superior ability as a young lawyer.

After this, clients came to him from various parts of the State. He appeared as leading counsel in many murder trials and his speeches in many instances are remembered to this day. His fees were always in proportion to the gravity of the case, and the surrounding circumstances, and the last murder case in which he appeared his fee was $5,000.

He entered public life in 1882 and was elected to the General Assembly of Georgia. There he gained additional reputation as a debater and some of his activities in that body are still fresh in the minds of many Georgians. He was elected to Congress in 1890, and while here obtained by the passage of a resolution the first appropriation ever used in the inauguration of rural free delivery of mail. He championed the automatic car-coupler bill and the eight-hour day for labor. He openly attacked the sale of liquor in the National Capitol, and it was finally driven out. Congressman WATSON sought reelection, and the contest was so bitter and the irregularities were so apparent that Maj. J. C. C. Black, of Augusta, who had been, upon the face of the returns, elected, refused the nomination, and another election was called which resulted in the defeat of Mr. WATSON. He then retired to private life. He practiced law for several years, retiring from the law in 1896 to accept the nomination for the Vice Presidency on the ticket with William J. Bryan. Following that defeat he turned his attention to literature. It was during this retirement that he wrote the "Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson." Other contributions to literature emanated from his brain and pen, chief among them, as believed by critics, being the "Story of France." "Napoleon," "Bethany," and "Waterloo" are also among his contributions which indicate the master mind. It was during this period of his career that his gentle, loving, and devoted wife gave him the inspiration that only a kind and loving wife or mother can bestow. She was mindful of every detail of his surroundings, and his environments were made pleasant by the happy smile and the womanly grace which adorned the household and beautified every nook and corner of their premises. By her ever-ready mind, heart, and hand he was enabled to enjoy the quietude in his study which was most essential in the production of the publications which will be handed down from generation to generation as among the most classic literature of modern days. In a conversation on one occasion with the late Speaker Champ Clark he told me that, in his judgment, TOM WATSON was the best historian in the United States.

In 1910 Mr. WATSON established "The Jeffersonian" and "Watson's Magazine" at Thomson, and published them until 1917, when Postmaster General Burleson refused them admission to the mails on account of Mr. WATSON's strong opposition to conscription. He then retired from the newspaper field. During this period he lost his children by death. He sought rest and quietude in another State, but when he returned from his Florida home he was a broken figure in every way. Though of strong mentality and wonderful determination this bereavement proved too much for him. Finally he mustered all the strength and power left to him and again entered newspaper work and purchased the Columbia Sentinel, which he edited up to the time of his death.

His friends entered his name as a candidate for President on the ticket in Georgia's preferential primary in 1920, and he led the ticket in the election in the State over two opponents. During the same year he became a candidate for the United States Senate and was nominated over two opponents.

He entered the Senate in March, 1921. In feeble health he delivered his maiden Senate speech on the Columbian Treaty, which was regarded by those who heard him as a most powerful argument.

An acute attack of asthma hastened his death, which occurred in Washington, September 26, 1922. I was on the committee appointed by the Speaker of the House which accompanied his remains to its last resting place at Thomson, Ga., the home of his youth. Along the line of travel in South Carolina and Georgia I saw large crowds of people at all the stations with bowed heads and tear-dimmed eyes. In Augusta, where our train was delayed for several minutes, thousands of people were standing, waiting to get a glimpse of their dead chieftain. When we arrived at Thomson there was a sea of people, variously estimated from ten to fifteen thousand in number, who had gathered there from all parts of the country to pay their last tribute of respect to the man they loved so well.

Many had driven long distances and some had traveled all night in order that they might have an opportunity to once more look upon the face of their departed friend, whom they had followed through many fierce political battles and who had kept in close touch with every phase of his life. I chanced to talk with several men on the day of the burial who told me that, on account of not being able to get rooms in which to rest for the night, they walked the streets of the town until the following morning.

The floral offerings were the most beautiful I have ever seen in a rural community. It was very evident that a large number of these were sent from distant towns and cities. They were superb in every way. A large number of bouquets of flowers were brought by loving, tender hands, signifying the love and esteem in which he was held by admiring friends. In this connection I want to incorporate in my remarks a portion of an article which appeared in the Atlanta Journal in the afternoon of the day of the burial:

It was a gathering thoroughly representative of Senator WATSON'S friends and adherents. It included the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the banker and the business man, the statesman and jurist, the landlord and the tenant; but in the overwhelming majority were men whose sun-browned features proclaimed them sons of the soil, men who followed the plow over the red hills of Georgia. For it was among them that Senator WATSON gathered his greatest following. They loved him devotedly, followed him unhesitatingly, and his pronouncement was their gospel. And now that he has gone they feel a loss as though one of their own flesh and blood had passed over the river.

His body was tenderly laid to rest by loving hands with garlands upon his grave.

His was the troubled life,
The conflict and the pain,
The grief, the bitterness of strife,
The honor without stain.

Death takes us by surprise,
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

But in the dark unknown
Perfect their circles seem,
Even as a bridge's arch of stone
Is rounded in the stream.

Alike are life and death
When life in death survives,
And the uninterrupted breath
Inspires a thousand lives.

Were a star quenched on high,
For ages would its light,
Still traveling downward from the sky,
Shine on our mortal sight.

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond our ken,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it falls to the lot of few men to make "footprints on the sands of time," and even when this impression is left a never-ceasing ebb and flow of the centuries too often obliterates the imprint. THOMAS E. WATSON was one of those rare geniuses whose path is marked so plainly that generation after generation will see and note it.

My personal acquaintance with the late Senator began shortly after he entered upon his term in the upper House. For some time he and I lived at the same hotel and, while I can not claim to have been intimate with him, I often met him. This acquaintance, although slight, greatly impressed me.

Years before when that remarkable work of his, The Story of France, first appeared, being a student of history and at that time making a practice of reading everything in that line that seemed worth while, I observed the favorable mention of the work by the critics and obtained a copy. It is no exaggeration to say that I was literally fascinated by it. From the moment I commenced to read it I could hardly lay the book aside and was astonished by the erudition it manifested. Through its passages kings and potentates, scholars and peasants, the classes and the masses, walked in one vast panorama like creatures of life. This work was soon followed by The Life of Thomas Jefferson, and then came The Life of Napoleon. As fast as they came out I eagerly sought them. Even to the most careful student of history these works presented a new view. Through them we could see the times they depicted in a better as well as in a more glowing light. To Senator WATSON the fact that some custom had prevailed for years meant nothing, nor did the glitter and parade of military heroes or the swagger of monarchs deceive him.

Naturally an iconoclast, with smashing blows he shattered many an idol forever. He stripped the tinsel from kings and showed the hollowness of their pretenses. He tore the plumes and epaulets from military heroes and exposed many of them as merely bloodthirsty ruffians with talents only for destruction. Filled with a love for the people, he lashed with scorn and contempt the exaltation of the aristocracy and pictured as never before had been done the wrongs inflicted upon the masses during those years which so many historians had imagined to be some of the most glorious in the history of France. The clearness of his style, the brilliancy of his expression, the wonderful erudition manifested by these works, made them famous all over the world, and to-day no one can really claim to be a profound student of history who is not familiar with them. Mr. Speaker, these words will constitute an imperishable monument to his memory.

In political matters he was fearless. With many of his theories and principles I was unable to agree, yet I could not but admire the ability and courage with which he presented and adhered to them. He did not hesitate to oppose the most powerful political leaders, not only of his own State but of the Nation. When he espoused a cause he supported it with his whole heart and with a vigor that was astonishing. Naturally the opposition he met was great, but no matter what enmity he might excite, what wrath he might provoke or what punishment might be feared, nothing swerved him from his course. The result was that his following was not confined to his own State but his influence was felt nation-wide. To a large portion of our citizens he was an acknowledged leader, and in his own State he became almost supreme.

It is seldom indeed that a scholar becomes a man of action. Often the student is of a shrinking nature and stands aside while the great procession of mankind moves on, or halts for counsel. But here was a man of great erudition and at the same time of most remarkable force and power.

Political questions furnished to him the breath of life and he was ever ready to champion what he believed to be the cause of the people. It is too early for us to pass final judgment upon his work. He accomplished much. How much, only some one with the gift of prophesy can foretell. We know that the world advances and that ideas rejected to-day may be almost universally accepted by another generation. Civilization has moved far since the days described in his story of France. Administrations have come and gone, kings and emperors have fallen, dynasties have been overthrown, and while war has not been abolished it has become more hideous and more detested by mankind generally. All through these changing tides of time the cause of the common people has advanced and in this advance he had his part, and it was a great one.

When I first met him I discovered that he was not at all the man I had expected to see. It seemed almost impossible that so slight a frame and so frail a body could contain so much force and energy. Nor did I expect to find a man who had already demonstrated his power, to be so unassuming. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that I might have an opportunity some time to sit beside him and have him relate to me how he conceived the plan and obtained the material for his great historical works. Unfortunately the opportunity never came, partly because he had so little desire to do anything that might seem like making a parade of his attainments. So in a social way I only knew him as a courteous and affable gentleman who arrogated nothing to himself and with whom companionship would certainly have been a pleasure.

He is now gone to a final rest, a rest well earned from a life of conflict, of unceasing activity devoted to what he believed to be in the interest of his fellowmen. I am thankful for this opportunity, as one from a State far removed from his home, to offer this tribute to his memory.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker—

Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passes from earth to rest in his grave.

Mr. Speaker, of a surety, Death is no respecter of persons; He visits alike the hovels of the poor, the palaces of the rich, and the halls of Congress. During the Sixty-seventh Congress the final summons has come to 19 Congressmen and to four United States Senators. The lesson should be clear to all:

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan which moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

On September 26, 1922, the angel of death touched the soul of the Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON, the distinguished junior senator from my beloved State, and this great Georgian peacefully fell asleep and was gathered to his fathers. "Know ye not that a prince and a great man has this day fallen in Israel?" Senator WATSON's long public life was an eventful and tempestuous one, and, during the course of it, he never asked nor gave quarter. He was, in the language of the great emperor, Napoleon, "the bravest of the brave:"

Cowards die many times before their death;
The valiant never taste of death but once.

Mr. WATSON was the peer in intellect of any man who ever graced the halls of the United States Senate. His life's successes should be an inspiration to the youth of our land. Born in Columbia County, Georgia, on September 5, 1856, his parents poor, but of honorable lineage, Mr. WATSON knew the pangs and hardships of poverty, and his heart and sympathy were ever true to the poor and struggling masses of humanity, and, to the day of his death, he was their able and devoted champion.

By his own efforts earning the money to pay for his schooling, later reading law at night while teaching school by day, he acquired a splendid education; defeats and adversities affected him not; and, by his indomitable will, energy, industry, and loyalty to the principles he believed in, he achieved renown in many fields. When admitted to the bar, he speedily took high rank among the lawyers of his section, and, when he retired from the practice of law, he was universally considered one of the ablest men of the profession in the State. In 1891 elected to the United States House of Representatives; in 1896 nominated by the Populist Party for Vice President of the United States; in 1904 nominated by the People's Party for President of the United States; and, in 1921, elected to the United States Senate from Georgia; thus we see the humble Georgia plowboy by his own efforts rise phenomenally to rare heights of fame.

During the two years Mr. WATSON was a Member of the House of Representatives he served with distinguished ability. It was my privilege to be parliamentarian of that Congress, and I remember Mr. WATSON well. Slim of stature, of frail physique, red haired, he presented a striking appearance. He was always in his seat when the House was in session, and paid close attention to his duties. Possessed of extraordinary oratorical powers and being a profound student of the science of government, he was a foe to be dreaded in debate by the ablest Members of the body. When he was recognized to address the House he always commanded the closest attention of the Members. During this Congress he introduced a resolution making an appropriation for the establishment of the rural-mail service in this country, thus becoming the father of this great government service which has been of incalculable benefit to the rural communities of the United States. In this same Congress he led the debate requiring the railroads to use automatic car couplers, the use of which has yearly prevented thousands of deaths.

Senator WATSON assumed his senatorial duties on March 5, 1921. His marvelous store of knowledge, his matchless oratorical ability, and his mastery of invective in debate soon gained for him high rank in the Senate. As an opponent, he was always respected and feared; as a friend and ally, he was thrice welcome. His public services in both branches of Congress entitle him to be acclaimed statesman.

To my mind, one of his greatest successes was his marvelous achievement in the literary world. His Story of France is recognized by all critics as one of the finest histories ever written of that Republic, and to-day a translation of this work is taught in the public schools of France. Among his great productions are The Life of Napoleon, the Life and Times of Andrew Jackson, Life of Thomas Jefferson, and Bethany, a Study and Story of the Old South. These literary gems will be read by our children's children, and their author has earned a niche in history that will entitle his name to be recorded among earth's great.

Senator WATSON's public life was a stormy one. God gave him a superb mind, and he was the most fearless and outspoken public man I ever knew. If I were to criticise the public men of to-day, it would be because of their lack of backbone as evidenced by their failure to voice and vote their convictions on public questions when political exigencies seem to decree otherwise; Senator WATSON was all backbone, and feared no living man. He was ever true to his convictions, even when threatened by the Federal Government itself with imprisonment in the penitentiary. He never swerved or deviated one hair's breadth, but boldly and publicly advocated his views on all public questions. Being a bold, aggressive, and positive character, Senator WATSON made bitter enemies and devoted friends. No public man in Georgia, nor I dare say anywhere in the United States, ever had as devoted, loyal, and loving a following as Senator WATSON enjoyed.

Thousands of people in my State loved him with a devotion that beggared words, they regarded him as truly their great tribune, and they followed him implicitly. They would not only vote for him when he was a candidate, but, at his suggestion, would espouse the cause of any other candidate in Georgia, firmly believing that whomever Senator WATSON championed for public office was the right man for that place. Senator WATSON might truly be called the Warwick of Georgia politics; he could make and unmake governors, and his political support was eagerly sought by Georgia political aspirants for office.

Mr. Speaker, public men are often misjudged, frequently unjustly condemned, made the butt of ridicule and contumely, many times lied on and slandered; and I have often wondered if public service was worth the price it cost. Congress had just adjourned, and I was at my home in Americus when the wires flashed the sad tidings that Senator WATSON was dead. Old and young men approached me on the streets overcome with their grief, some with tears in their eyes, and, with faltering voice, choking with emotion, said: "Senator WATSON is gone; who can take his place?" It was my privilege to attend the funeral of the deceased Senator. When the train bearing his body arrived in Augusta, Ga., en route to Thomson, the station and streets were thronged with men and women of high and low estate, with bared heads, who had gathered to look upon his bier and do him honor. Their every look and gesture betokened the sincere sorrow they felt at his taking away. This same condition obtained at every station through which the train passed from Augusta to Thomson. When we arrived at this beautiful little city, the streets leading from the station to the Senator's home—Hickory Hill—were draped in mourning, and the town was filled to overflowing with Georgians who had gathered from every section of the State to pay a last loving tribute to their beloved dead. A great concourse of people, variously estimated at from 10,000 to 15,000 people attended his funeral—not an idle crowd gathered there out of mere curiosity, but a sober, solemn assemblage, many with tear-dimmed eyes. When I recall this picture, Mr. Speaker, I answer, "Yea, public service, if faithfully rendered, is worth the price!"

God's choicest gift to man is a pure, loyal, and devoted wife. Senator WATSON was indeed fortunate in this respect, for in 1878 he won the heart and hand of Miss Georgia Durham, of Thomson, Ga., who, with two beautiful granddaughters, survive him. It is my good fortune to be intimately acquainted with Mrs. Watson, and to know her is to love her—a pure, gentle, retiring, intellectual, and refined lady of the old southern type. I shall not attempt to depict the home life of the deceased Senator, of which, as well probably as of much of his public success, the gentle spirit of the sweet and cultured companion of his married life was the inspiration. Nor shall I dwell upon those traits of character that grappled his friends to him with hooks of steel, for I am fortunate in having before me the written tribute of one who knew him better than I. At my request, Mrs. Alice Louise Lytle, for many years a business associate of Senator WATSON and associate editor of his paper, the Columbia Sentinel, has prepared a tribute to her deceased friend, which I shall now read and publish as a part of my simple tribute to this great man, lawyer, scholar, author, and statesman.

Senator WATSON died at the height of his power and popularity, in harness, at his post of duty, while toiling unceasingly to ameliorate the condition of his fellow man.

> And could we choose the time, and choose aright,
> 'Tis best to die, our honors at the height,
> When we have done our ancestors no shame,
> But served our friends and well secured our fame.

THOMAS E. WATSON—THE MAN.

(By Mrs. A. L. Lytle.)

Of THOMAS E. WATSON, the orator, the lawyer, the scholar, and the Senator, the world has heard much and read much. A great deal of what has been said and written would make the man himself appear as a bloodless, unlovely character, devoid of almost every human attribute.

But the real THOMAS E. WATSON, the man who loved and protected the birds and squirrels of his beloved "Hickory Hill;" the man whom his dogs coaxed to go to walk with them; the man whose horse stood at the lot gate and whinnied as he saw him coming for his daily ride; the man who founded a bank that the poor people of his section might borrow money on security that the other banks refused to risk; the man who never forgot a friend—this is the THOMAS E. WATSON I knew in the fourteen years of daily association with him.

The deeds of kindness he did, these will never be all known, because many of those who benefited are gone, and he never told.

The old friend whom he kept in his home place for so many years; the old music teacher whom he loved and whom he never forgot when the fruits of summer were ripe, when the winds of winter blew—she is still living here, and will bring tears to your eyes as she speaks of "TOM'S goodness" to her.

The old schoolmate whom he found living on a little, isolated farm, suffering from a broken hip, and with none but negroes to minister to him, unable to leave his bed because of the lack of a wheeled chair. A wheeled chair appeared and the old schoomate spent many happy days in the sunshine because of that thoughtfulness.

There was a wide roof outside the window of his study; the window at which he wrote looked out on it, and it was no uncommon sight to see six or eight redbirds, as many squirrels, and other birds feeding, in the depth of winter, on the cracked nuts and corn which was spread there for them by the kindly-faced man who peered at them from the window as he wrote some of those wonderful articles that have been read by the world.

His home was the home of the average southern gentleman; and the hospitality of the old régime still existed there.

If "company" came, there was no flurry and no worry; it was simply a case of adding more chairs to the table, and more food. His friends were always his friends, and welcomed as such.

When he was writing, he was never disturbed; the home revolved around his work—and there was never anything permitted to disturb him in the hours devoted to that work.

Simple in his tastes, loving all that was beautiful, he had gathered in that home in the years that he had spent there books, pictures, bits of choice old furniture, rugs, hangings, and ornaments that gave the home an air of comfort and elegance which has so long been the keynote of old southern homes.

Music he loved passionately, and it was a beautiful epoch in his life when he would play his old "fiddle" to the accompaniment of his daughter—whose death was one of the greatest sorrows in his life; and he never touched the fiddle after her death.

Sensitive, the hurts he received in the many battles he had lived through left scars that he never forgot; but there was less of the bitterness than one would almost expect, when he would talk over the stormy days.

He softened, with the years, as all of us must, and he regretted much that had happened in the days of political difference—and he never harbored ill-will against any who showed a tendency to play fair with him.

The old negroes clung to him as they had clung to his father who had owned them; in the "Quarter" now connected with Hickory Hill there still lives the old negro mammy who nursed him; she will live there until she, too, goes on that long journey which her "Mar'se TOMMY" has gone on—and she, too, mourns still for that kindly master who never forgot her.

Quick-tempered, and as quick to forgive; generous, but just; honest to others—and exacting honesty when he knew it was possible, but forgiving many debts when he knew they could not be paid.

Interested in all that concerned his friends; ambitious for those he loved, giving even his bitterest enemies the benefit of doubt—his days were full of interest to him.

When he had at last reached the goal of his ambition—the United States Senate—there were some of us who feared that his health would not be equal to the tasks he would have to face, but he would smilingly say:

Let me die in harness; I will at least have accomplished some of the things I have wanted to do for so long.

And that wish was granted him.

He died as he had lived—interested in what was of interest to his fellow-man, and with his desk cleared of every obligation there.

And in his going, there are some of us who will try to do, as bravely and as thoroughly as he would have us do, the things he wanted done.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my physical condition for the last few days has prevented me from preparing an address for this occasion or writing a manuscript. I once heard a great man, who later adorned the United States Senate, introduce the late Senator WATSON to a vast audience, and in that introduction he said:

I am presenting a man with whom I have not always politically agreed, but I have found it much easier to criticize his views than it was to answer his arguments.

I think that statement defines the position of a great many friends of Senator WATSON who admired him for his great ability, and agreed with him on a great many propositions, but disagreed with him on others.

Mr. Speaker, we have come to-day to commemorate, in our humble way, the life of a great man, and I might say that it is too early after his death for even his friends, or those who knew him best, properly to estimate or appreciate his great ability and his great work, or to forecast their estimation by future generations.

When William Shakespeare, the greatest individual of the human race, who has been referred to as "an intellectual ocean that touched all the shores of thought," when that great dramatist "shuffled off this mortal coil" and proceeded to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns," possibly none of his contemporaries realized that the brightest star had faded from that constellation of great men who adorned and enriched the Elizabethan age. When a few of his relatives and friends gathered to lay him to rest in the little church yard at Stratford they did not dream that the spire of that small church would stand as a sentinel finger to guide the literary pilgrims of future generations to his grave. They no doubt failed to realize that they were then standing upon hallowed ground and that throughout coming ages the men of letters and of learning of the world would stand above that sacred dust with bowed, uncovered heads and pay reverence to the memory of the "rarest genius and the richest soul that ever lived and loved and wrought of words the pictures, statues, robes, and gems of thought."

When Robert Burns, the Bard of Scotland, whose singing pen made the little rivulets of his native land historic streams, who "sang old Scotia's praise in terms that will vibrate in the human heart until all songs shall cease," when that great genius passed away, bowed down as he had been by adversity, the victim of obloquy and derision heaped upon him by those baser, meaner, smaller souls who could not break his independent will, scarce honor he received from them, who did not deign to claim him as their own until death and fame and immortality had claimed him first.

When Edgar Allan Poe, America's greatest poet, whose Raven sits above the door of every aching heart and throws his ominous shadow across the path of every troubled soul; when that great poet passed away, amid the rags of poverty and woe, the American men of letters of his day little dreamed that history would accord to them the position of satellites to him, the greatest literary luminary of his time.

When THOMAS E. WATSON, the South's greatest writer, if not the greatest writer in America, dropped his pen and fell asleep to awake only in that "radiant Hereafter," of which he once said that Hope was the creator and Faith the defender, little wonder it is that his invidious contemporaries would attempt to withhold from him that recognition of his great services and his great ability which the unbiased judgment of future generations will accord.

I have read, Mr. Speaker, his History of France, and to me it is the most remarkable publication I have ever seen. A man who was not educated in the French tongue, who had never set foot on European soil, wrote the history of the French Republic so accurately that it became a standard work, not only in his own country, but was even translated and became a standard work in France. Recently our distinguished colleague from North Carolina [Major BULWINKLE], who rendered such gallant services to his country in the late World War, told me on the floor of this House that when he was in Paris he went into Brentano's bookstore and asked for the best history of France that they had, when they presented him with the one written by THOMAS E. WATSON, of Georgia, and told him that although it was written by an American author and was translated into French, it was nevertheless the best history of France he could buy. I related this to Senator WATSON on one occasion, and he told me that some of his friends had begged him at the time this book was written to have it copyrighted in France, but he did not take it seriously enough to do so, and he added that by that failure he had lost thousands of dollars on that publication.

His Life of Thomas Jefferson, his Life and Times of Andrew Jackson, his Life of Napoleon, and his History of France will always stand as monuments to his great ability. But in my opinion his short editorials such as his tribute to "Uncle Remus," "The Dream Children," the "Wine Cup," and a great many other such articles, will carry his name farther down the years to come than will any other achievements of his great career. My opinion is that, as Napoleon once said about himself and his civil code, Senator WATSON will go down to posterity with his books in his hands.

But, Mr. Speaker, these are not the only considerations to commend him to the future. Some one has said:

I wrote my name upon the sand,
And trusted it would stand for aye;
But soon, alas, the refluent sea
Had washed my feeble lines away.

I carved my name upon the wood,
And after years returned again,
I missed the shadow of the tree
That stretched of old upon the plain.

The solid marble next, my name
I gave, as a perpetual trust;
An earthquake rent it to its base,
And now it lies o'erlaid with dust.

All these had failed; I was perplexed;
I turned and asked myself, "What, then?
If I would have my name endure,
I'll write it on the hearts of men."

Senator WATSON wrote his name on the hearts of the toiling masses of America by his unremitting, relentless service in their behalf. On the floor of this House, on the 17th day of February, 1893, as has been said by one or two of the gentlemen who have spoken from his State, he offered the amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill which established for the first time the rural free delivery service in this country, which to-day carries the mails to millions and millions of people far removed from railroads and steamship lines. He was an advocate of the eight-hour day for labor. He fought for automatic couplers on railroad trains. He was a pioneer in the fight for the parcel post, in opposition to the exorbitant charges of the express companies.

I remember reading an editorial once from a northern newspaper in which it was said that THOMAS E. WATSON was not popular in Wall Street, that he was not popular with the money power, but that he was known and loved by millions of the farm hands of America.

In commenting upon that statement Senator WATSON said, "Write this on my tombstone." He preferred such an epitaph; and, regardless of what may be said of him here to-day, regardless of what the press may say, regardless of the opinions of men in public life, his services will carry his name on down to future generations as long as men toil for a livelihood.

He was a historian of great ability, whose brilliancy and fluency of expression were charming to every reader, and whose accuracy under the circumstances was most astounding. He was a writer of short stories and editorials who has seldom been equaled, and never surpassed, in American literature. He was a statesman who looked beyond the present hour and fought always for what he believed to be the betterment of mankind. He was an American with the courage of his convictions, and the most relentless toiler I have ever known.

He was a man, take him for all in all.
I shall not look upon his like again.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, when the soul of THOMAS E. WATSON was cut loose from its moorings and entered upon its journey to its Maker, one of the most picturesque and one of the greatest men Georgia ever produced passed from life to eternity.

When he died there was more grief and sorrow among the men and women in Georgia and more people went about their daily pursuits with bowed heads and sad hearts than was ever before manifested over the death of any other one of her citizens.

Certainly over a hundred thousand citizens of Georgia and many thousands in other States intensely deplore his death. His followers and real friends believed in him, they trusted and loved him and to most of them his death was a calamity; and yet, we should not be unmindful of the fact that the grave will open its portals to all of us, soon or late.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the North Wind's breath,
And stars to set, but all—
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, O Death!

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hues tinge the ripening grain—
But who shall tell us when to look for Thee?

The mourners at the tomb of Senator WATSON, and others who sorrow over his demise, are not confined to the State of Georgia. He had his friends and followers in every State in this Union. He had become a national figure before he was ever elected to the Senate. The "Jeffersonian," which was unjustly suppressed, and the Columbia Sentinel went to every State in the Union. Senator WATSON'S articles which appeared from time to time in his various publications and the speeches he made in the Senate were read by more people in the United States than the writings and speeches of any other man in public life.

It is common knowledge among Members of the Senate and House and officers at the Capitol, when visitors to the Capitol from different States in the Union entered the gallery of the Senate the first question asked, as a rule was: "Where is TOM WATSON?" or "Point out Mr. WATSON to me." This is indicative that Mr. WATSON was a prominent and well-known figure in the minds of the American public.

While not in the prime of life and yet with an intellect as vigorous as it was when he was a young man he was called to his last reward when he least expected it. Senator WATSON did not expect to die so soon. He and I in the privacy of his room and my own room at the George Washington Inn have talked over the issue of life and death, and I know he expected to live to a ripe old age. He certainly expected to live out his present term as Senator from Georgia and to be reelected for another term without opposition, which I believed and hoped would be his lot. And yet death intervened and put an end to his earthly ambitions. His labors for his people were ended; his writings in the Columbia Sentinel were brought to a sudden termination; his brilliant speeches in the Senate which charmed Senators and attracted the attention of the people all over the United States were finished; he had fought his last battle and had won his last victory. Fate decreed that life's honors for him should end forever.

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour;
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

His death was a great blow to me. I was sick in bed at my residence in Athens, Ga., when a telegram came early in the morning announcing his death, and I was in the hospital when his funeral occurred. For that reason I was denied the opportunity of being present on the funeral occasion where thousands and thousands of people from all over Georgia had gathered to pay their last respects to their departed friend.

His short and brilliant record in the Senate, added to the record which he had made during the last quarter of a century, easily placed Senator WATSON among the foremost leaders of the Republic.

One of his most aggressive political enemies, Mr. T. W. Loyless, a brilliant writer, in an article entitled "Peace to his soul. Peace to our State," while criticizing therein much of Senator WATSON'S public record, began his post-mortem analysis of his public life as follows:

To-day, some fifty thousand people in Georgia, maybe more, several times that many throughout the South, mourn the death of a man whom they sincerely believed was one of God's annointed; to them the consecrated, self-sacrificing apostle of democracy undefiled—the friend of man and champion of the common people.

Later on in this article he referred to Senator WATSON as follows:

A great genius has passed from earth, a wonderful intellect has been dimmed by death, an eloquent tongue silenced, and a gifted pen put for the last time upon paper.

And again he writes:

For almost a third of a century THOMAS E. WATSON has been the "stormy petrel" of Georgia politics and public life, with his penetrating cry heard above the tempest in which he reveled. For fully half of that time he has been the virtual dictator of Georgia politics; making and unmaking men at will, through the "balance of power" that he wielded with but a wave of his hand—and which weak men feared and fawned upon.

Some people in Georgia envied Senator WATSON, some were jealous of him, some despised him, some cursed him, some hated him, and most of the politicians feared him, but all of them welcomed his support and were happy to get it in any political conflict, either State or Federal. From a political point of view, he was by odds the strongest man in Georgia and had been so for many years.

In his race for the Senate over 104,000 white people of Georgia voted for him against Hon. Hoke Smith, then United States Senator, a great lawyer and a strong man from every point of view. He received about 4,000 more votes than the combined vote of the three strongest candidates in the election which was held to select his successor. In passing it may be said of Senator WATSON in regard to this race that he was the only man ever elected to the American Congress, either to the House or Senate, who did not spend a dollar to become elected.

His friends do not deny that he was the "stormy petrel" of Georgia politics for several decades, but one thing his enemies can not truly deny, and that is that his contests have always been in the interest of the people—the masses—and as some express it, the common people of the State. Like Victor Hugo he was a man of the people. He was the best friend in public life the poor people had; his love for them was not only genuine but it was a passion with him. He entertained the same tender feels toward them that Gray did when writing his "Elegy in a Country Churchyard"—

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
Their sober wishes never learn'd to stray;
Along the cool sequester'd vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

Let not ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the poor.

Most men have moods both in public and private life. At times Senator WATSON would be as tranquil as a lake in the calm of a summer's evening and at other times he would be more or less tempestuous. I say this in all kindness to him and with all respect to his memory, because it was my pleasure and good fortune to be on intimate terms with him during the last years of his life. He was a friend to me in sickness and in health. It was a friendship which I shall cherish and hold in affectionate memory as long as life lasts.

Though his real friends intensely mourn his death, there is a measure of consolation in the thought of the poet who wrote of a departed friend:

The storm that wrecks the wintry sky
No more disturbs his sweet repose
Than summer evening's latest sigh
That shuts the rose.

When his mind was not burdened with "matters of state" he was pleasant and agreeable, kind and sympathetic, and as friendly as any public man I ever knew. He had a quick perception of the ridiculous and a keen sense of humor. Whether one agreed or disagreed with his public record, those who knew him well greatly enjoyed his companionship.

Senator WATSON will be remembered by his countrymen generally as an able lawyer, a renowned orator, a great historian, and a statesman of national repute.

He was one of the greatest criminal lawyers ever admitted to the bar in the State of Georgia. He successfully tried numbers of murder cases from one end of the State to the other; his services were sought from the mountains to the seaboard in defense of those charged with murder. Whenever he spoke to juries the courthouse was full of people who listened to him in utmost silence and with intense interest. Besides he was a learned civil lawyer. In his early days he regarded law as Blackstone did, who said "Law is a jealous mistress." The best years of early manhood were given to the study and practice of law.

His fame as an orator is known to all men. When he spoke in Georgia he had more people to hear him than any other public man during my time. His audiences ran from 5,000 to 20,000 people. When he last spoke in the city of Atlanta he had the greatest audience that ever assembled there to hear a public speaker.

As a historian, it is my purpose to say but little, because his reputation as such is world-wide. Senators and Members of the House who have delivered memorial addresses on the life and character of Senator WATSON have thoroughly covered this phase of his public life. I remember going over to the Senate to see him one day on business and failed to find him in his seat. I asked Senator CARAWAY, of Arkansas, whom Speaker Clark once told me was the best lawyer in the House, if he knew where the historian of the Senate was. Senator CARAWAY replied: "Judge, you will find Senator WATSON in the cloak room."

I believe it is universally conceded by Members of the House and Senate that Senator WATSON was the most scholarly historian in the American Congress. My humble opinion is that he had no equal as a historian in the United States.

The first speech I ever heard of Senator WATSON making was when he was running for the legislature in McDuffie County, Ga., as an independent candidate against what he termed the "courthouse ring." This was 42 years ago. I was a college boy at the University of Georgia at that time. It impressed me so that I put part of the speech in my boy scrapbook. He opened his speech as follows:

Fellow citizens, in my boyhood I loved to picture to myself a future where manly ambition was cheered on by generous words and by strong helping hands.

I had thought that the people, proud of the high resolve of him who battled onward and upward, would gather applaudingly around his course, and on his pathway would strew flowers. The years have passed on, and I know now 'tis written, before the ascension lies Gethsemane's Garden. I know now that the pathway is lined with brambles and at each footstep I have passed the thorns.

In those young days my fancy had made an Eden filled with purpling hopes of public honors. The sweep of the years robs all such gardens of their tenants, the gates close forever, and about them flash the swords of fire.

Notwithstanding a stiff fight was waged against him he was triumphantly elected.

One will observe from reading this brief excerpt of this speech that he then had ambition in life to acquire fame. Indeed this is the ambition of most men, and yet to succeed fights have to be made and mountains of opposition overcome. Some orator whose name I can not now recall said:

To abide in the hearts and affections of our fellow men is the most gracious lodgment we can establish during the years of existence in this life; and to be treasured in the memories and minds of our friends and neighbors after we have been released from this tabernacle of clay and from the responsibilities and burdens of humanity is a gratifying anticipation.

It is true that these longings are common to human nature; and as all men, however humble or exalted, have personal friends and social surroundings, the desire of the heart to this extent is accomplished toward almost every soul on earth. But as the field of human usefulness is greatly enlarged to some, and the influence of good deeds and noble purposes grows broader, and the power of accomplishing useful ends increases, in an equal ration the love of our fellows and the esteem of the public center upon and embrace some fortunate subject, and surround him with a broader cordon of love and affection in the honor paid him by his countrymen. So that, if one can look forward to the time when he shall no longer tread the pathway of life beside his dearest personal friends, or move along its highways amid the plaudits of an admiring public, and yet feel certain that he shall still retain the love of the former, and the honor and esteem of the latter, he may see with prophetic eye that, even though all his purposes and aims have not been accomplished, his life has been a success, and he has indeed secured the best rewards of human effort, and the noblest crown that human love can bestow upon him.

The first speech I ever heard Senator WATSON make was in the famous Colquitt convention of August, 1880, a copy of which I also put in my scrapbook. Governor Colquitt had a majority of the delegates but Democratic usage required a two-thirds vote to nominate. After long and much balloting it developed that he could not get the two-thirds vote. Hon. Patrick Walsh, a Colquitt man, delivered a speech which enraged the anti-Colquitt men. In concluding this speech, he said:

We have come here to nominate Colquitt and we are going to stay until Christmas to do it.

When Walsh concluded, Senator WATSON, being a delegate to this convention, arose from his seat and with pale face and quivering lips spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the speech of the delegate from Richmond [Mr. Walsh] is not that of a Democrat to Democrats or of a friend to a friend. It is rather the language of a master to a slave.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that a silken cord may lead me, but all the cables of all the ships of the seas can not drag me. Rather than follow the course of the delegate from Richmond in his rule or ruin policy, I would see the party cut adrift from its past and its traditions like an old ship which has worn out its usefulness.

He concluded—

Nail to the mast the tattered flag,
Set every threadbare sail,
And give her to the God of Storms,
The lightning and the gale.

The position Senator WATSON assumed in this short speech put him on the map of Georgia politics. By this one speech he became famous and from that day on he had to be reckoned with in all political campaigns of importance in the State of Georgia.

This speech also disclosed another phase of his character; namely, that he had in him the elements of a fighter which, during the following years of his life, blossomed into full fruitage.

His speeches in the Senate will compare favorably with the speeches made by any of the great orators of the Republic. When it became known, or was published in the Washington papers, that Senator WATSON would speak on any public question the galleries were always full of men and women. Time and again various Members of the House, both Republicans and Democrats, would leave the deliberations of the House and go to the Senate when it was scheduled that Senator WATSON would make a speech. It was an undisputed fact that he was one of the Senate's best debaters.

I may be wrong about it, but I have seen the time when I thought Senators on the Republican side were unwilling to enter into a debate with him or challenge the positions and contentions he was making upon some vital public questions. While the Republicans, as a rule, disagreed with him, and now and then this was true of a few Democratic Senators, yet both were loath to get tangled up with him in a debate. He was at his best when debating, and the Senator who interrupted him generally got the worst of it. I do not mean to discount the ability of Senators on either side of the chamber, yet in general debate Senator WATSON was the peer of any of them.

Another unusual feature with regard to his public speaking is that he never used a manuscript. He never read any of the speeches he delivered in the Senate, and he told me that he never corrected, revised, or altered any of them.

It is a remarkable thing to find combined in the brain of one man the intellectual qualifications which are essential to the making of a great lawyer, a brilliant orator, and a celebrated historian. God bestows these attainments upon but few men and yet Senator WATSON possessed them in a high degree.

During my last campaign for reelection I was often asked the question how Senator WATSON stood with his colleagues. I had no trouble in answering the question. He was greatly respected and admired as a lawyer, orator, and historian by every Member of the Senate. He was on good working terms and cordial relations with every Democrat in the Senate and likewise with all Republicans with the exception of three or four Members on the Republican side. As the public knows, he became involved in one or two acrimonious colloquies with two Senators, both of whom were from a section of the country which had little sympathy for the southern people. He likewise stood well with the Members of the House who came in touch with him in an official way. Particularly was he on cordial terms with every Member of the Georgia delegation.

I wish to make only one other observation regarding Senator WATSON. Notwithstanding many people did not approve of some of the contentions he stood for during his public life, and notwithstanding during this time he had made political enemies, no one ever questioned his personal and political integrity. Whether friend or foe, all will testify that he lived and died an honest man.

When Senator WATSON realized dissolution was approaching, if the infirmities of body and mind enabled him to speak, I honestly believe he could say of the life he led among his fellow men as Sir William Blackstone said—

Untainted by the guilty bribe,
Uncursed amidst the harpy tribe;
No orphan's cry to wound my ear,
My honor and my conscience clear;
Thus may I calmly meet my end—
Thus to the grave in peace descend.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, we mourn to-day the loss of a superior man—one who was of consequence in the world—one who possessed a clear brain, abundant learning, a wealth of general information, and a quick sympathy for the cause of the workers of the world. His handiwork is known throughout our country and even beyond its confines. His memory is cherished everywhere by true lovers of liberty. His name will linger in human households, and human hearts will warm in gratitude because of his splendid service to men and women everywhere.

He was one of the greatest teachers of our time. Gentle in his personal characteristics, kindly and sympathetic in spirit, deep-true in his loves, making room for sentiment in his life, he was like an alabaster vase through whose thin-hewn walls shines the inner light. The fire which burned within him with beautiful intensity, giving out always a compellingly sincere message, was the eternal advancement of a free and sovereign people—his own. He burned with the belief that the ballot of the voter was the trophy won by those brave reformers of bygone days who followed the lead of the many pioneers who had preceded them in the revolt against tyranny and oppression. He stated many times that the ballot was not only the sacred souvenir of those days when the great struggle was on for its possession, but that it was the bloodless weapon by which men might defend their all, their wives, home, children, their very liberty and life, from those powers whose oppressions would drive men again into servitude. The advancement of the human cause through the ballot and through honest organization was his battle cry. He believed in political parties, though never did he advocate blind party allegiance, but rather that the voter should adhere to that party whose purpose and principles were those of the voter himself.

Let me quote him, speaking at Nashville in 1904:

> It does seem to me that it is high time that the average man * * * should do some of his own thinking and act for himself according to his own light, and not forever obey the crack of his party whip.

Endowed with a deep and throbbing love of the blessed, plain people of the earth, he knew no other nor sought no worthier service than their advancement. His creed is summed up in these earnest words of his:

> I do not speak for the lordly magnates of class legislation. I do not speak for those who for one hundred years have stood at the doorways of national legislation begging for special favors. No! The men whose cause I would plead before the bar of American public opinion are chiefly those who toil in the hundred different places of industry and who have never lifted their voices to ask anything of this Government except just laws and honest administration. They are the men of the mine, the mill, the shop, and the field. They are the obscure toilers who in time of peace send pulsing through the veins of commerce the rich blood of prosperity. They are the men who, in time of war, spring into the battle line at the tap of the drum, and with patient feet follow the march, and with fearless heart make the charge upon which is based and builded the world-wide fame of your commanders to whom you rear monuments in the open places of your cities.

For these convictions he battled and suffered to the end, and because of them enemies pursued him with a bitterness which made no allowance for honesty of belief. They gave him many a bitter hour because of the difficulties they threw in his way. They arrayed against him many even of those he was trying to serve. But never did he by word or written expression depart from his creed. As was well said of him, "Mr. WATSON never lifts his feet from his rock of principle."

His warm and vibrant love of humanity and its needs gave him an almost prophetic insight into and vision of the legislation that was vital for the people's welfare. He was truly the father of rural free delivery mail service, an instrumentality of education of the great farming population of this country and a convenience to them beyond estimate. He outlined and recommended an income-tax law at a time when it was political heresy to do so. It is remarkable to note that of the 17 planks in one of the People's Party platforms that he mainly formulated, all of them are now the law of the land.

Ever a true, burning disciple of pure Jeffersonian, Jacksonian democracy, his life was dedicated to molding into useful laws the tenets of this political faith. He fought a constant fight, nor let his armor rust, for those principles which spoke to him of ultimate, glorious, perfect freedom for Americans. He fought to make good men out of American boys. He strove to build back into prosperity desolated homes, so that the chains of special privilege might be broken, and the laws that oppressed them might be removed. He battled for a square deal for all. He was a manly, but a relentless foe. Twenty years ago he said:

> With the convictions which I hold, Roosevelt [and he meant all those who held beliefs destructive of the things he held most dear] represents the thing that I would fight from morning to night every opportunity I got, every day of my life from now until the folding of my hands across my breast.

Those words were like a clear-cut vision of his life's journey, for never thereafter was his great brain dormant an instant, nor his eloquent voice unused, in the business to which he had consecrated himself, believing and knowing that Divine Power itself was using him as an instrument to unfetter men from evil oppression and forward them on the road of onward progress. He wrote the story of his own life in 1908, and he said at that time that he had no more political ambitions, but was content to give himself to his literary and editorial work. Even after this, however, came the clarion call for further service in the ranks of the people. So, true to his own prophecy, his last hours were given in the same consistent manner to the service of those he loved, the great mass of the American public. Let him speak to you a last farewell:

> So with your bright eyes looking into mine and your cheers ringing in my ears I go on my way encouraged, inspired with the belief that it is a glorious thing to represent a people like this, and I can well afford to leave the harvest to time and to the God who rules us all.

Sweet must have been his last days. From a richly deserved seat in the Senate of his country he had the satisfaction of seeing the first reaping of this harvest. His old enemies were adopting his creed as their own. His cherished reforms were being enacted into laws. His dreams of the awakening of men's consciences were being realized. Success was crowning his life-long efforts. The dawn of a better economic day was at hand.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, what I shall say of Senator WATSON will be from the viewpoint of one who, in regard to political matters, usually disagreed with him. In fact, it was the exception rather than the rule for me to find myself in accord with his views. It is also necessary for me to speak of him from outside the limits of close personal acquaintance, for my acquaintance with him personally was of less than two years' duration, while my contact and conversation with him were limited to brief and infrequent meetings.

It was therefore from his writings as well as from the power he exercised and the influence he exerted over the thought and actions of others that I have judged him.

It will not be denied that Senator WATSON was an unusual man, so unusual that it is not easy to find a single character with whom to compare him. The distinctive traits of many individuals were combined in him. He wielded a trenchant pen, and the person was to be pitied against whom he turned it. He was a master of language, so that from it he could forge thunderbolts to be hurled in defense of the cause he espoused or against the individual unfortunate enough to call forth his wrath or displeasure. He could receive as well as deliver blows, and seemed never to be quite so much himself as when in the thick of a battle royal.

When THOMAS E. WATSON put on full armor, which was his belief in the righteousness of his cause, and went forth to do real battle the usual result was that the people of Georgia were soon arrayed in hostile camps, the one side ready to slay him and the other willing to die for him. Of course, it was inevitable that such a man should make bitter enemies. No one would have been more sorely disappointed than he had he failed to do so. On the other hand, he made and kept to the end an increasing number of deep and strong friendships. And the friends who were permitted to see beneath the exterior would seem to have the better of the argument, in making up a just estimate of the real man, over his enemies, who saw only a front of steel.

As a rank outsider, far removed from the field of the greater part of his activities, and usually holding views widely divergent from those advanced by him, I have often admired his great force and ability and wished that they might be employed on the other side of the question. At the same time, in fairness to those who honestly hold opinions differing from my own, I can readily understand what admiration, coupled with devotion, was entertained by those who fully embraced his views and believed him to be fighting their battles. It is only thus can be explained his great power and influence exerted during so many years over so large a number of his fellow men.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, the sentiment that brings us here to-day is an honor to the living as well as to the dead, for honor to the dead is an incentive to the living.

We are advised by Holy Writ that "there is a time to weep; and a time to laugh; a time to mourn; and a time to dance," and in the official life of Members of the House of Representatives, to-day is dedicated as a day of mourning. We have ceased to think the thoughts of our parties; we have banished the dreams of ambition; we have put away the trappings of place and pride and left our mirth and employment, to spend a brief while in solemn reflection upon the life and virtues of that distinguished Member of the United States Senate who has been translated to the realms of eternal bliss.

It is true that many great and distinguished Members of that august body have passed over the river and gone to that Great Beyond, but, Mr. Speaker, I measure my words when I say that among that great number there has been few, yea very few, who gave more complete and unfaltering devotion to their State and the Nation they loved than did the illustrious lawmaker, Senator THOMAS E. WATSON, of Georgia, who on the 27th day of September, 1922, answered the summons and was guided into that radiant hereafter of which hope is the creator and faith the defender.

The news of the death of Georgia's greatest commoner caused more genuine sorrow—sorrow that penetrated the very soul and literally brought tears of anguish and genuine grief from the very hearts of men and women, than that of any other Georgian in the memory of the living. He died in the way he always said he wanted to die—like a soldier at his post of duty.

He was an intellectual giant; a man among men; highly gifted in speech and with the pen; his genius never doubted, or his profound ability questioned. He was a champion of the causes of the common people as distinguished from the classes. He waged an unbroken fight for their emancipation from what he conscientiously believed to be the bondage of big business, concentrated wealth, and predatory interests.

He fought their battles with a courage unsurpassed, and every pulsation of his heart beat in harmony and unison with theirs; their cradle songs and funeral hymns were his cradle songs and his funeral hymns. The love he cherished for them was fully reciprocated, as he was the idol of his devoted followers. His word to them was a Holy Gospel; his views once published to his legions were accepted and adhered to as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and no better citizens can be found, many of whom are my warm personal friends. They were affectionately termed by him as "The Old Guard," and were ever ready to do the bidding of their "Chief," and they, like him, lived to see the day come when a great many of the political principles sponsored by their beloved leader, and loyally supported by them, ultimately were written upon the statute books of the Nation.

He regarded as a sacred trust the loyalty and confidence that his followers reposed in him. It was a political asset of priceless value, but never did he abuse it or capitalize it for personal gain.

No man in Georgia, or any other State of the Union, ever commanded the devotion and love of his adherents as did the sage of McDuffie, nor never before in the history of the Empire State of the South has there been a man with so large a personal following. For 30 years he held the balance of power in political affairs of the State; made and unmade governors; elected and defeated Senators and Congressmen. Though engaged in many acrimonious political battles, sometimes wearing the wreath of victory and sometimes going down in defeat, yet it can be truly said that he never took any unfair advantage of a political opponent, even though the contest may have been most bitter.

In some political campaigns which he led, he knew he had no chance of success. This was notably true in '96 when he made the race for Vice President, and in 1904 and 1908, when he ran for President on the People's Party ticket. He truly said:

> Any soldier can fight bravely when he knows his are the heavy battalions that are sure to win. The truest soldiers are those who fight gallantly when they know they can not win. Why, then, do they fight? Because, sometimes, it is better to have fought and lost than not to have fought at all.

As an orator he had no superior. Few men in the Nation could sway the masses to such a degree. He could play on their emotions like a master of a violin plays on his delicate instrument. His hearers were moved by his matchless eloquence and their souls stirred by the fire of his spirit. Every energy of his being was put forth and his words flowed like streams of molten metal, burning their way into the hearts of his audience.

This remarkable man, whose memory we commemorate today, a true son of the soil of Georgia and of the South, has been truly likened to four of the Republic's most historic figures:

> Jefferson, Henry, Otis, and Jackson were all reflected in THOMAS E. WATSON. He loved liberty with the passion of Henry; he always held to his political doctrine untarnished, as did Jefferson; he possessed all the courage and determination of Jackson; and he had all the great heart and flaming tongue of Otis.

As a lawmaker, first a member of the General Assembly from McDuffie County, then the Representative of the people of the tenth congressional district, and later as United States Senator from the Commonwealth of Georgia, he wrote his name indelibly in the history of his State and the Nation.

It was his fiery eloquence in the legislature in 1882 in behalf of the cause of temperance that caused the enactment of the local-option law under which the people voted out the saloons in 117 counties. It was during his service in the House of Representatives in 1890 that he secured the first appropriation for the establishment of rural free delivery mail service, whereby he made the daily Postal Service of his Nation become the—

> Messenger of sympathy and love;
> Servant of parted friends;
> Consoler of the lonely;
> Bond of the scattered family;
> Enlarger of common life—for the people toiling out in the field under the blue skies and near to nature's heart.

Coming to the United States Senate in 1921, his brilliant career was cut short by his untimely death, but no man ever served a constituency more zealously, unselfishly, and unfettered. He served all the people alike, friend and foe. He was recognized as the best read man in the Senate, and it was not long before he was considered as one of the leading debaters of that body.

Conspicuous as he was in political affairs of the State and Nation, and famed as a leader of the bar, however posterity will remember him as a scholar and historian, for his distinction finds the happiest, the most abiding and everlasting form in the fruitage of his pen.

As an author he occupied a permanent place, and had he given to the literary world nothing else except "The Life of Napoleon," he would have made for himself a name as a writer. His "Story of France" and his "Life of Jefferson and Jackson" stamp him as a profound student. The Philadelphia North American Review in 1898 said, "Many histories of France have been written, but none equals this." In his writings his talent flourished to its true harvest and his brilliant and versatile mind gave expression to what must have been its deepest love. By these illuminating pages he erected a memorial to himself that will endure until the end of time.

His style of editorials for the Jeffersonian and the Columbia Sentinel was epigrammatical. At times he was a master of satire; then again through his writings flowed a gentle kindness and a sympathetic touch.

He was ever true to his principles; a Southern gentleman to the manner born; a devoted husband and father. In the days to come he shall stand—> side by side with scholars as their shining faces tend upward to the higher summits of thought, soul to soul with patriotic statesmen who give their days and nights to the noble problems of just laws, healthy conditions, happy homes. Wherever the orators shall speak with tongues of flame he shall be heard; wherever warriors strike for liberty, poets embody truth and majesty in verse, statesmen evolve civilizations, and scholars and philosophers and scientists conquer new worlds, he shall be known and honored.

In the little cemetery in the town of Thomson, where the morning-glory points its purple bugle to the sky, and the sigh of the cedars mingles its music with the soughing of the pines, the willow and cypress grown around his tomb with loving but mournful embrace which will ever be a shrine where boys and girls, men and women in generations to come will be inspired by the achievements of this illustrious son of Georgia.

Hon. Grover C. Edmondson, for many years private and confidential secretary of the late Senator WATSON, probably better acquainted with him than any other man, has prepared a beautiful tribute to his chief, which I incorporate as a part of my remarks.

To those who knew the kindly figure in his home; to those who were in daily contact with him in his business affairs, his literary work, and the making of his newspaper, The Columbia Sentinel—the Benjamin of his old age—to those who knew the steadfast effort and adherence to high ideals invested in every act of his career; to those who treasured all that he wrote and accepted as Gospel all that he said; to unnumbered boys and girls who received material assistance from this self-made Georgian and American, in their efforts to reap the advantages of education; to the men and women who found inspiration in what he accomplished outside of public office; and to the older heads who followed their leader into the thick of every battle and shared with him the heartache of every defeat, the death of THOMAS E. WATSON carries a sense of personal loss.

When Capt. John S. and Mrs. Watson named their son—the subject of this sketch—it did not occur to them that he would find the name "T. EDWARD WATSON" awkward and unsatisfactory. Even in those early years the youngster had opinions as original as the ones characterizing the maturer years of his life, when this Warwick made and unmade governors, his word being sufficient to shape the destiny of nearly every leader in our political Israel. It was during his 'teens that he silenced the "EDWARD" and wrote thé name to suit himself—THOMAS E. WATSON. And now that name is treasured in the hearts of hundreds of thousands of Americans, in almost every walk of life, who find it difficult to realize that TOM WATSON is dead.

A distinguished writer, speaking of Senator WATSON's "strange influence," says that he succeeded because he understood the Georgia "Cracker" better than his contemporaries. That is probably true in a sense; and it is also true that the Georgia "Cracker" understood TOM WATSON better than he did WATSON's contemporaries. Our people love frankness, sincerity, and courage; and those qualities rendered Senator WATSON estimable as a man.

He was, like all sensitive and sensible men, profoundly impressed by the immense misery to be seen all about us. He was not radical; he was not destructive; it is true that he proposed to tear down the bad, but he offered something better than the existing order of things. When he wrote the famous Ocala platform, nearly every prominent journal denounced both platform and writer; those journals could see nothing good in either the "creed" or the "dreamer"; but the dreamer lived to see every one of those demands either enacted into law or accepted by the "conservatives," who once bitterly denounced both dreamer and dreams.

Discussing Populism, at that time, the conservative Atlanta Constitution preached against the work of this "political adventurer" who had sprung from the "ranks of the disgruntled." Another conservative journal, the Savannah Morning News, used this language:

"Such a lot of cranks, demagogues, small politicians, dangerous theorists, and agitators never before collected anywhere" as this band of Populists. But, those great newspapers have changed their views and they have written beautiful editorials for the income tax; the direct election of Senators; the eight-hour day, and the rural free delivery system.

Senator WATSON's political activities during those days—the nineties—won him national fame. His work bore good fruit. Others gathered the rich harvests, but that neither discouraged the Populist nor lessened his faith in the permanency of the splendid reforms written into that Ocala platform by the original exponent of Populism. When the young lawyer closed his Thomson law office to become the tribune of those reforms, he established a permanent place in the hearts of his followers; the flag then intrusted to his care was never dipped to the enemy, adversity and defeat sharpened his weapons, both offensive and defensive; and his shining lance like the white plume of Navarre was seen at the front line during every battle.

This leader of another "lost cause" did not surrender when Fate turned the battle against him; he did not desert his comrades, as others did, when the Fusion movement destroyed their organization: he continued the war until the dominant parties accepted his principles.

He passed through the vicissitudes common to all reformers, and he emerged unscathed from every fight.

His enemies could not shake his faith in his followers; they could not turn those followers against their leader.

But, Senator WATSON's victories are not confined to the field of politics. The permanency of his fame rests upon his achievements in the world of letters, where his ripe scholarship, good taste, and broad sympathies are set down in that great volume Napoleon and in that doubly enriching masterpiece The Story of France.

The orator's influence can not be conveyed to printed page; the brilliant lawyer whose eloquence shaped verdicts and wrote judgments for clients can not extend his intellectual superiority beyond the confine of his own generation; the publicist whose burning message swayed the multitude will continue to live in the hearts of his comrades; but Senator WATSON's permanent memorial is found not in those achievements but in the children of his brain, his books.

Georgia has turned out many great sons; the names of Bob Toombs, Ben Hill, Alex Stephens, William H. Crawford will be cherished by our people forever and ever. Those great men had friends and followers, but not the devotion found in the bosom of a Watson man for TOM WATSON.

Senator WATSON was without a superior as lawyer, scholar, orator, business man, publicist, and statesman. He could measure swords with any man, and his vast storehouse of information enabled him to debate any subject in any forum with all comers.

His home life was ideal; he loved the birds, the trees, the flowers, and they loved Senator WATSON. He was their protector, their friend.

His associates loved him and found him generous in everything.

His servants were not slaves in his eyes; they were human beings and treated as such.

If he ever uttered a harsh word to a coworker I never heard it during the years I spent with him.

He loved his followers—his friends—and when letters came to his house announcing the death of a member of the "Old Guard" this soldier who was not afraid to die broke down and cried like a little child.

During his stormy career he received inspiration from his wife, to whom he was married in 1878, and who followed him through every battle, sharing his victories and helping him to overcome his sorrows.

Mr. BELL, of Georgia, took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, my first personal impression of the man to whom we have assembled to pay a tribute of respect was through meeting his wife—a true southern gentlewoman—shrinking in manner yet fearless, her silvering hair rippling back from her brow; a bit of old lace at her throat, caught modestly together with an heirloom cameo brooch. She won my heart for all time.

The little book I hold which is a collection from Senator WATSON's writings bears the following dedication, penned a decade before his death:

To Miss GEORGIA DUNHAM:

In whose pure affection and loyal soul a briefless young lawyer found favor in the good year 1877 and who not so very long afterwards—for the course of true love, as from time immemorial, did not run smooth—became Mrs. Thos. E. Watson, and who has, ever since, walked the long path by his side, through health and through sickness, through joy and through sorrow, through sunlight and through tempest, with the unfaltering devotion of the typical wife, and who now turns with him to face the afternoon of life, without any sort of fear, and with the peace of soul that passes understanding.

I want to commend to each of you the little collection of prose gems thus dedicated. In the Bible we read—

Every tree is known by his own fruit. For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is evil; for of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaketh.

This compilation was published 10 years before he came to the Senate; when he was less battle scarred and world worn. As we knew him here his matchless mentality was struggling to overcome physical weakness.

In "Glimpses Behind the Curtain" we find a rapid, telling portrayal of the very human weaknesses of men whom we have not been accustomed to consider as other than giants, and between the lines of this portraiture may read a certain plea that we shall judge him as has been our judgment of them by the good of their strongest, truest selves rather than their weakness. So hoping that in this way you may have a new vision of the good in the soul of TOM WATSON we did not perhaps really know I read to you from these pages words more forceful than any I could utter. His was a personality not immediately understood.

Soon after it was my honor to become a member of this body a friend from my own town came to the Capital on a special mission which I could not enter into beyond giving him desired introductions. My constituent was a native of a southern State—one of those men as gentle as they are fearless, yet with unchangeable convictions of right, and relentless and merciless in carrying out of such convictions. For this reason, as we passed Senator WATSON I stopped to present my friend to the Senator. I was rather surprised that the exchange of greetings seemed perfunctory on both sides. Remembering how of the world's strongest writer, the Apostle Paul, it was said "his letters are weighty and powerful but his bodily presence is weak," I said, after we had passed on, "you knew that was Senator WATSON, of Georgia?" "TOM WATSON, and I passed him by like that?" He had not realized that WATSON, like Napoleon, his ideal, was not a physical giant.

[From "Reverie and Suggestion."]

The next great event and happiness of your life was when the sweetheart to whom you had been awkwardly, timidly, making love, let you "cut out" all the other boys, and walk home with her.

Weren't you proud? And wasn't she pretty?

Those clear, pure eyes; those rosy cheeks; those smiling lips; that wealth of glossy hair; those pearly teeth—heavens! how you worshiped her.

Would you have swapped places with a king that day, when she first accepted your invitation to a buggy ride?

When she came close to you and pinned the hyacinth or the violet to your coat lapel, your heart beat pit-a-pat, and you held your breath till the dainty boutonnière was fixed.

And when you had worn the flower till it was wilted, you reverently laid it away in some book—didn't you? And you have them yet—nor is there gold enough in all the world to buy those faded flowers!

After ever so long a time, as you thought—ages, it seemed to your impatience—she said "Yes"—and let you kiss her.

Wasn't that a glorious night?

You walked on air as you went back to your home, didn't you?

You were in such a state of happy exhilaration that you couldn't sleep.

Are you ashamed to admit that deep down in your heart was a tender thankfulness to the God who had blessed you with the love of so good a woman?

Ah, well—you were married to her, and you two began the upward struggle together.

How hard the climb of the hill! What labor there was; what disappointments; what days of bleak despondency; what nights of black despair.

In that terrible climb of the hill, did you neglect your wife?

Did you fail of that tender consideration which was her due?

Did you sometimes bring your clouded face and sour mind to the fireside, and morosely impose your own sufferings upon her?

Were those sweet lips made to tremble in mute pain? Those fond eyes to shed secret tears?

Happy the husband who can say, "I never did. Wretch that I am—I can not."

The years pass, pass, pass—and now you are on the western slope of the hill. The wife who climbed the hill with you is still at your side. No matter who else failed you, she did not. No matter who else found fault with you, she never did. If she ever spoke to you unkindly, and served you reluctantly, or fell short of perfect wifely devotion, you did not realize it.

How can you reward your noble wife? Will you not prove to her that you appreciate her? Will you not bring to her that splendid loyalty which a proud woman prizes more highly than a miser prizes gold?

In word, in thought, in deed, will you not be as true to her as she has been to you?

Will you not prove by unfailing tenderness with which you minister to her happiness, now, the depth of your remorse for your shortcomings in those early years?

Will you not call back the spirit of the days of your courtship, and be as proud of her kiss, just as happy to take her to your arms, as on that glorious night when she promised to be yours, and yielded her queenly lips to your kiss?

But perhaps you are of another sort. Perhaps you think all this silly. Maybe the softening touch of Christmas-time softens nothing in you. I pray God it may not be so.

For your sake, as well as your wife's, listen: The only human being that you can count on to stand by you, in spite of "the world, the flesh, and the devil," is your wife.

Children will grow up and pass onward—out of your life and into one of their own. Relatives and friends may go with you a long way, but they will not go all the way. Your wife will.

In all the universe you can't be sure of anyone but her. Then make the most of her. Are her cheeks faded? Kiss her on the lips, and then see the roses blossom once more on that pallid face.

Have her eyes been swollen and dim with tears? Put your arms about her and tell her you love her just as much as you every did.

Then watch the light of joy kindle those eyes, until they sparkle as brightly as in the days of youth.

Ah, it is so easy to make a woman happy, if the right man wants to do it. And the right man to make your wife happy is you.

Think of the nights you were sick unto death, and she nursed you; think of the fearful agonies of the birth hour, when she brought your children into the world; think of the long-drawn years in which she has daily done the drudgery of a slave; think how she has had to bear the cross of your troubles, as well as her own; think what she has had to go through with in rearing your children; think of her cramped, dull, and monotonous life at home, while you were mingling with the bustling crowds of the outside world.

Think of all this, brother, and allow much for the jaded, faded wife. Go to her and warm your own heart, as well as hers, by talking to her in the old, old way of lovers.

Court her again, as you courted her when you sought her hand.

Tell her that she is just as pretty as ever. This may possibly not be the truth; but if a lie at all, it will be the whitest one you ever told. The Recording Angel may feel in duty bound to charge it upon the debit side of your account, but as he washes it out afterwards with a tear he will enter an item to your credit on the other side of your ledger, and he will write it in letters of gold.

THE WINE CUP.

It is a warrior whom no victory can satisfy, no ruin satiate. It pauses at no Rubicon to consider, pitches no tents at nightfall, goes into no quarters for winter. It conquers amid the burning plains of the South, where the phalanx of Alexander halted in mutiny. It conquers amid the snowdrifts of the North, where the Grand Army of Napoleon found his winding sheet. Its monuments are in every burial ground. Its badges of triumph are the weeds which mourners wear. Its song of victory is the wail that was heard in Ramah: "Rachel crying for her children, and weeping because they are not." It never buries the hatchet; its temple of Janus never closes its doors. No dove of peace ever carries its message; in its hand is never the olive branch. It sends no flag of truce, and receives none; its wounded are left where they fall, and its dead bury their dead. Every citadel that it storms it devastates; and in every charge which it makes its cry is, "No quarter."

Those who fall before its onset die deaths of shame; and they go down to dishonored graves to which love can bring no willing tribute of flowers, and over which pride can rear no enduring monument. To its prisoners it grants no exchange, holds them to no ransom, but clutches them fast, in a captivity that is worse than death, and which ends only at the grave.

The sword is mighty, and its bloody traces reach across time, from Nineveh to Gravelotte, from Marathon to Gettysburg. Yet mightier is its brother the wine cup. I say "brother," and history says "brother." Castor and Pollux never fought together in more fraternal harmony. David and Jonathan never joined in more generous rivalry. Hand in hand they have come down the centuries, and upon every scene of carnage, like vulture and shadow, they have met and feasted.

Yea; a pair of giants, but the greater is the wine cup. The sword has a scabbard, and is sheathed; has a conscience, and becomes glutted with havoc; has pity, and gives quarter to the vanquished. The wine cup has no scabbard and no conscience, its appetite is a cancer which grows as you feed it; to pity, it is deaf; to suffering, it is blind.

The sword is the lieutenant of death, but the wine cup is his captain; and if ever they come home to him from their wars bringing their trophies, boasting of their achievements, I can imagine that Death, their master, will meet them with garlands and song, as the maidens of Judea met Saul and David. But as he numbers the victims of each, his pæan will be: "The sword is my Saul, who has slain his thousands; but the wine cup is my David, who has slain his tens of thousands."

FORTITUDE.

Do not become discouraged! Don't lose heart.

You may not be able to see the harvest where you have patiently sown the seed, but be assured of this: No seed is lost.

The truthful word manfully spoken, the earnest effort honestly made, the noble creed consistently held—these are things which do not perish; they live on and move the world and mold the destinies of men, long after you are dust.

Leave cowardice to the cowards; leave servility to the slaves. Be a man—proud, though in homespun; free, though in a hut.

Own your own soul!

Dare to listen to your own heartbeat. Between you and God's sunlight let no shadow of fear fall.

What is there to live for, if you are never to think, never to speak, never to act, save as the echo of some master? Better the death of the brave than the long misery of the mental serf.

Not always is it easy to know the right—very often is the road rough. Human praise can be won by shorter routes. Honors and riches are not always its rewards. Pleasanter days and calmer nights may be yours, if you float smoothly down the tide of policy, steering deftly by the rules of the expedient.

But has life nothing loftier than this? Is there no divine voice within you that calls for better things? Is there no great pulse-beat of duty within you; no flame of the warrior spirit, when insolent wrong flings its gage of battle at your feet?

Are you willing that the Right shall call for aid, and you give no succor; that Truth shall plead for help, and you bear no witness?

Is the sacred torch of Liberty—passed on from hand to hand, down the ages in which brave men dared to keep it lighted—to find you unwilling to hold it aloft?

Shall the temple of civic freedom, reared by the great men who are gone, stand vacant, calling mutely, calling vainly for votaries at the shrine?

Was it all a mockery—this long struggle your forefathers made for Justice? Is it an idle tale—this story of the heroism with which the rights of the people were slowly won?

Not so—not so! Levity may slight, and ignorance may disregard the blessed heirlooms of human endeavor, of patriotic purpose, of high-minded self-sacrifice—but they are there, and, like the signal fires of the highlands, they call heroic hearts to duty!

You may have desponded, but you must not despair. You may have stumbled, but you must not fall. You will rouse yourself, and press forward. You will do your duty—for that is your religion.

If Wrong triumphs, it shall not claim you as a partner in the crime.

If the light dies out in the homes of the people, the curse of the unhappy shall not blast your name.

You shall be a man—loyal, fearless, independent, ready for work, and loyal to the last, to the creed which your heart approves.

Men like these—and no others—won every treasure in the storehouse of liberty, every jewel in the crown of good government, every thread in the golden tissue of religious and political freedom.

Men like these—and no other—are going to keep alive the sacred fires our fathers kindled, are going to stamp out the foul heresies that imperil our rights, are going to fight to the death those who would turn back the march of human happiness, and are going to rededicate this Government to the principles upon which it was founded!

Stand firm and fear not.

Brave men who are nothing more than brave, rush into the combat, get worsted and quit.

Brave men, who are something more than brave, take no defeat as final.

There is an order to which many men belong that knows no creed, but is directed by fraternal regard, rather than narrow obligation. They call themselves the best people on earth, and in one respect, indeed, they are, because with them "the good men do is not interred with their bones" while they allow the ill to live after them, but instead they say: "The frailties of our brothers we write upon the sand." So let us forget, if we might have seen them, any frailties of this man except lessons they may bring to us, and remember the gentleness and sweetness of his life, his own recognition of failure to gain all of his ambitions and his abiding desire for the right. We must think of his bravery and fearlessness in defense of his standards and of his dauntless fights for these ideals. We must do our duty as we see it, and then go bravely forward. None but the Master may make the final verdict as judge. We may go the right road, we may go the wrong, in the trust we are going right. And yet even on the wrong road there may come at our time of mortal peril a wonderful flash of lightning from the sky, showing us where we are, and on the very brink we may look up in self-surrender to the Master and say: "I am wrong, help me; set me right." No one shall ever say that such a last prayer is refused by Him who pitieth all His children.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly safe to say that the history of Georgia, the Empire State of the South, for the last 40 years has very conspicuously mingled in it the life work of Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON, whom we do well to memorialize to-day. It is likewise not going too far to say that the history and the thought of the United States during these years have been very greatly impressed and influenced by his life and speeches and writings. In many ways he went far ahead of his times. He advocated more than 30 years ago many of the great moral movements which were then scorned and ridiculed as visionary and impracticable, and which have since then reached full fruition in the legislation of the country.

He was always a foe to sham and an apostle of the genuine. He believed in the doctrine: "Hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may." He was never daunted by difficulty or swayed in his thoughts or his actions by circumstances. He did not follow the herd. He did not follow anybody. He led where his own convictions pointed. From this distinguished feature of his character the most useful lessons can be drawn. Certainly great influence was for this reason exerted by him.

It is a sad but nevertheless true thing to say that one of the distressing signs of the times is the disposition of people to follow the leader, to let others do their thinking, to go with the tide. It is one of the discouraging symptoms of the day. The world is full of illustrations of the fact that men and women far too often allow others to do their thinking; likewise that they formulate their actions upon bases that have little or no relationship to fact or truth or righteousness or the object to be attained. Senator WATSON did much to displace this with individual thinking. He set a high example of such thinking, and made it so plain that he who would might follow.

Mr. Speaker, this is peculiarly an age of propaganda. The country is now more largely governed by propaganda than by any other means or force. Big offices in Washington, with big staffs, make big money by securing widespread publication of many kinds of propaganda. They call themselves publicity bureaus; they are really propaganda bureaus. In hundreds of instances, those concerned put out their own propaganda. The public is so bombarded with it through the newspapers and pamphlets of all kinds that it is almost impossible to tell when one reads his paper or his mail what motives or what interests are back of what he reads.

I believe I can safely say that but few men have appeared who, with keener edge of satire and ridicule, have punctured the bubbles of deception and false propaganda than has our brilliant deceased friend.

Mr. Speaker, I wish I had TOM WATSON'S facility of language that I might paint a word picture of his struggles in early life and the indomitable will with which he overcame all obstacles. He was between eight and nine years old when the Civil War closed. His family—the best of Georgia stock—who had been modestly independent, had had their property swept away by the ruthless hand of war. Therefore, the most impressionable and formative years of his young life were spent amid the horrible days of reconstruction—the bitterest times that the South ever saw—times as bitter as any country on earth before or since has ever seen. But the courage and ambition of this frail country boy were undaunted. He determined to secure an education, to make a career, to carve out his own fortune, to help his people, to become their tribune. How well he succeeded has been many times told in the public prints of Georgia, and in both Houses of Congress during the progress of these eulogies.

Not more true nor impressive have been the stories of the early life of Garfield, "The Canal Boat Boy"; of Henry Clay, "The Mill Boy of the Slashes"; Andrew Johnson, "The Tailor"; of Abraham Lincoln, "The Rail Splitter"; of infirmities and early struggles of Alexander Hamilton Stevens, or of other indomitable men of history. I dare to say that even as the South he loved so well displayed its finest spirit in its darkest hours, so did he manifest his greatest courage and his most indomitable character when ill fortune did its worst toward crushing him. And even as the South rose triumphant over all opposition, so did he rise above every misfortune, every disaster, every discouragement, to the highest position in the gift of his State, to be the recognized tribune of his people, to an admitted loyal personal following greater than ever held by any other man of his generation.

He was a commoner in the highest sense of the term. He believed in the plain people. He fought for the common man. He proclaimed the rights of the under dog. The passion of his life lay in demanding justice for the common, everyday man. The powers of wealth, dignity, high position, influence, nor anything else ever caused him for a moment to forget the needs of humanity.

Nearly every one of us in our schoolboy days has declaimed the great address of Spartacus to the gladiators in which he said:

> Ye call me chief, and ye do well to call him chief, who for twelve long years has met upon the arena every shape of man or beast which the broad empire of Rome could furnish and who never yet lowered his arm.

I call those who knew Senator WATSON to witness that for forty long years he met upon the arena of politics, the forum of public discussion and the courthouse, all comers, of all creeds, of all kinds, on all subjects, and fought them to a finish in every matter of controversy, and never shirked or dodged or equivocated or lowered his flag. He appears to have had no fear. Nothing daunted him. Nothing could stop him. Neither the world, the flesh, nor the devil—neither the power of the church, or state, or wealth—neither the Army, or Navy, or the Government—nothing could swerve him from the free, full, and forcible expression of his own convictions.

That he loved to fight a bit too well and possibly fight too often is probably true; but better far to err on this side than on the more numerous side of equivocation, dodging, backing, and filling that too much characterizes business men, professional men, and politicians of the present day.

Indeed, the critics of our departed friend could find many things in his career to criticize—so they could in the career of any other red-blooded, aggressive, progressive man. That he had a very high temper is true; that he often gave way to his temper is true; that he sometimes carried his opposition to things he did not like too far is true; that he was a good hater is true. A wise old man once proclaimed his love for a good hater and made out a very good case along the line that the man who has not the power of hating likewise is too apt not to have the power of loving and the aggressive force necessary to accomplish things in a world in which all progress includes, at least, a considerable element of strife.

Passing over his well-known struggles to get an education, the beginning of his practice of the law, the rapid growth of that practice, the winning of financial success—all of which are well known—may I mention a few crucial periods of his career?

In 1880, when but 24 years old, he was a delegate to the famous Georgia gubernatorial convention of that year. He electrified the old-timers with the most eloquent and dramatic speech of the convention—on the losing side, as was most often the case with him—but losing bravely, as usual.

Two years later he became a member of the Georgia Legislature—made a conspicuous record—and closed the long and fierce debate on prohibition with a singularly eloquent speech.

Following his advocacy of the common man he led the fight for the Farmers' Alliance in 1890; was elected to the Fifty-second Congress; was nominated for Speaker by the Populists; was easily the leader of that party, and added to his reputation of fearlessness and constructive ability.

As the Populist nominee for Vice President on the Bryan ticket in 1896, while Mr. Arthur Sewell, of Maine, was the Democratic nominee on the same ticket and was favored by Mr. Bryan, TOM WATSON again bravely made an utterly hopeless fight. As the candidate of the People's Party for President in 1904, he made a marvelous campaign against hopeless odds to revive the party. He appeared to care nothing for success, or, at least, he continuously subordinated success to the principles of his cause.

Through all the intervening and following years, he, with tongue and pen, kept up his fight. The success, the popularity, the trials of his papers and magazines; his wonderful work as a historian, acknowledged and acclaimed by friends and opponents alike, all these make a thrilling story too long to tell.

Again, in 1920, when in the Georgia presidential preference primary no candidate appeared to espouse the principles he believed in, he became the candidate himself and rolled up a vote that astounded the State. Later in the same year, in one of the most spectacular campaigns ever known in the South, he won the nomination to the United States Senate by a popular and county unit majority.

Then came, as a fitting rounding out of his marvelous life, his useful and constructive career in the Senate, resulting in his not only holding all his old friends, but gaining the respect of his opponents and winning over to himself many new friends and supporters.

His indomitable industry and will continued to the very last. He made the last speech of the session in the Senate. He died proclaiming the doctrines and fighting the battles of the people.

Passionately loving the South, his own State, his own people, he centered his love first of all about his hearthstone, and largely drew his inspiration from his family associations. I wish I had the time and the delicacy of touch to paint his beautiful home life—his love for his devoted wife and her ever-continuing inspiration to him—his love for his children, whom fate took away from him. And to these should be added, as testimonials to his magnetic nature, the devotion accorded him by the managing editor of his paper, Mrs. Alice Louise Lytle; by the assistant editor, Grover C. Edmonsdon; by his circulation manager, "Uncle Charlie" Atkinson; in a word, by the whole force of those who worked with him. From this safe and sane base, his influence and his following radiated throughout his State, the South, and the Nation.

Those who loved him, and they are legion, can greatly rejoice that—

> They have well learned, in hours of faith,
> This truth, to flesh and sense unknown,
> That Life is always Lord of Death,
> And love can never lose its own.

Editor, orator, author, statesman, tribune of the common people, friend of mankind—eternal peace be to you.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, for more than twenty-five years it was my good fortune to enjoy the personal acquaintance of the distinguished Senator whose life and public service we commemorate to-day.

No native or adopted son of Georgia ever made a greater impress upon its people than did Senator THOMAS E. WATSON. This occasion will record no sentiment that can add to his fame or glory. It is a part of the history of our country and his name will be treasured forever in the hearts and affections of those who knew him.

The ambitious youth seeking for inspiration will gather it from the record of his achievements. In a modest country home, nestled among the bare red hills of Georgia, he may enter and form the acquaintance of an obscure, red-headed, freckeled-face boy, who was ushered upon the stage of life during the tempestuous days of political excitement, just preceding the Civil War, and whose life career seemed shaped by destiny to be not unlike the years of his early existence.

Through the misfortunes of war he became a victim of poverty and, therefore, learned early in life to battle against adversity. In these contests he was not always victorious—although sometimes beaten to the ground—yet, he never surrendered.

Penniless and without friends to aid him, he was driven from college at the end of his sophomore year. As the principal of a country school he accumulated sufficient funds that he might have returned to college and completed his education, but domestic complications were then to be considered. It had become a choice between the completion of a college education and the care of parents crushed by poverty in their declining years. He did not hesitate to choose, and, as was so characteristic of his nature, he pursued the most honorable course. This he did, however, without relaxation of private study. By industrious reading at nights, and other spare moments, he was soon enabled to pass the bar examination and enter upon the practice of law. By the end of the second year his earnings were such that he arranged to purchase the dilapidated farm from which the misfortunes of war had driven the family.

The parents were once more comfortable and happy; for a time at least, fortune seemed to smile upon him. The ability of the young barrister was soon recognized—he became one of the leading lawyers of his section, and honors were in his reach.

He first became a member of the Georgia Legislature and served with distinction. His election to Congress followed. Serving in this body he secured the first appropriation for rural free delivery of mail, and rendered other valuable service to the country; but, casting his lot with the new People's Party, he was defeated for reelection at the end of his first term. Political reverse, after reverse, followed, and for a time he seemed to have met his political Waterloo.

He returned to the practice of law and was soon regarded not only one of the most profound lawyers of the State, but also as one of its greatest forensic orators and successful advocates. His professional services were sought in every section of the State, and his clients extended from the mountains to the sea.

Mr. Speaker, I may have reached that age in life which inclines my mind to magnify the happenings of youth, but if my judgment is not in error, the man whose memory we commemorate to-day was, when in his prime, one of the greatest trial lawyers I ever saw at the bar. His fortune grew with the passing years, but his professional success—phenomenal as it was—did not seem to satisfy nor to compensate his restless mind for the political reverse and disappointment which had come to him. Even thus, while fortune smiled, he determined to retire from both politics and the law and devote himself to literature. Upon his accomplishments in this field rests the most enduring achievement of his many-sided career.

One's contemporaries are not always best qualified to judge as to his merits. We of to-day may be swayed by affection, or biased by prejudice, but the historian of to-morrow will have a clear vision of the past and should render unerring judgment. I have no doubt that when the record of Senator WATSON has been written it will reveal him as one of the most scintillating stars in the constellations of the universe. His keen intellect, retentive memory, and love for information, combined with a capacity for study and reflection, made him an "intellectual ocean whose waves beat upon almost every shore of thought."

His numerous writings proclaim his genius, but his Life of Napoleon and his Story of France combine historical research and knowledge with such literary ability as to entitle him to a place of high rank among the best authors of the century.

So far as the obtaining and the retention of office is concerned he may not be considered a practical politician, though it must be admitted that when selected by the Democratic Party he served with signal ability in the legislature of his own State and in both Houses of the United States Congress. In addition to this he was twice the nominee of the People's Party—once for President and once for Vice President. Returning to the Democratic Party he again became a candidate for President, and was afterwards elected to the Senate of the United States, in which position he died. Even those who may assert him to have been an impractical politician must admit that for more than a quarter of a century he so dominated the political fortunes of others that he made and unmade both State and Federal officials.

All forms of oppression were abhorrent to his nature. He hated corruption whether in church or state, and with the heart of a crusader he attacked always where he suspected its existence. Senator WATSON had the courage of his convictions. He never hesitated to approve what he considered right, or to denounce what he believed was wrong. In speech and writings, at times, he was caustic, but in personality he was pleasing, and in emotion always generous.

The plan of Christian salvation teaches sacrifice. Senator WATSON's life was one of self-sacrifice. Is a life void of sacrifice worth the living? Were the accomplishments worth the price he paid? Ask those who best knew him; ask those who best knew the great work he did; ask those who were with the funeral party; those who saw the crowded stations between Washington and Thomson; ask those who saw the thousands of sad-faced men and women from every walk of life, and from every section of our country, who thronged the streets of his home town in the hope of catching a last grimpse of their fallen chief, and to pay a simple tribute of respect to his memory, and they will answer—yes. No greater tribute of love, no greater inspiration for public service was ever witnessed.

Senator WATSON, at an early age, was happily married. His gentle wife survives him. A son and a daughter came to bless his home, but the death angel kissed them into eternal sleep years ago. This masterful intellect, with all its abiding faith, could never understand why such crushing grief should come to him, but let us hope—let us believe—that to him the mystery has been revealed; that father, son, and daughter have joined in a happy reunion on the golden shore of eternal life where there are no sacrifices to be made, or disappointments to be endured.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is a mournful pleasure to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to the life and character of the lamented THOMAS E. WATSON, who was representing his native State and mine in the upper branch of Congress when death cut short his brilliant career.

Others may have been in more intimate touch with the eminent Georgian than was my privilege; others may be more eloquent in eulogizing his public service and personal virtues, but I dare say none had more admiration for his brilliant attainments nor could appraise his worth more fairly.

Residing in opposite extremes of the great State which gave us birth, personal contact with Mr. WATSON was necessarily limited by distance and by the infrequent occasions when association was made convenient or practicable; but after he came to Washington, we were often together in conference over matters of legislation and other questions in which we were mutually interested. Upon these occasions I never failed to enlist his sympathetic interest and cooperation. I was thus afforded an opportunity to study at close range the human side of the man and found him not the least stilted or impulsive either in manner or speech, but a most charming companion, and moreover a safe adviser when his advice was sought. One could not fail to be impressed by his earnestness, his sincerity, howsoever one might withhold approval of his views upon some public questions, as I sometimes did, yet always with a lingering admiration for his plausible logic and his unwavering sturdiness of purpose. He seemed never to forget anything he had heard or read and was as familiar with the history of his own country and that of the nations of the world as with his alphabet.

I venture to assert he had the confidence, devotion, and loyalty of a band of adherents never enjoyed by any man in public life in Georgia.

Often caricatured by his critics as a many-sided man—vitriolic and unrelenting in his bitter moods, and at other times emotional and tender as a child—he was an enigma to friend and enemy alike. It was my pleasure to know only the better side of his nature. If he had a worse side, it was not revealed in my intercourse with him. If he attained eminence as a publicist, he was even more distinguished in the world of letters, his literary productions ranking with those of the most scholarly writers and most profound thinkers of his time. His flaming genius, his wonderful grasp of a subject, his capacity to get the pith and substance of a proposition, his mastery of details, marks him as a man among men, whom to know was to respect and admire. True, he may have had faults, both of temper and tongue—few among us have not—but with it all he will be acclaimed by impartial biographers as one of the outstanding figures in the affairs of his State and Nation.

Sometime the secrets of this mystery called death we may know; and when our departed friend turned to the silent and unknown future, let us believe he could rely with unfaltering faith upon that most impressive and momentous assurance ever delivered to the sons of men—

"He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

Mr. Speaker, some of our colleagues are unavoidably detained at their homes in Georgia, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity of paying a sincere, if humble, personal tribute to the late Senator WATSON. I enjoyed only a very slight acquaintance with the Senator, although, in common with the American people, I had long heard and known of him before I came to Washington. I took early opportunity to seek out the Senator and gain his acquaintance. In my State, among my people, as among the American people generally, Senator WATSON was regarded as having those qualities which always command admiration from the American people. He had a high degree of intelligence, he had complete and absolute honesty of purpose, and he had courage, morally and physically, of the very highest order.

In my campaign last summer there was injected as an issue a measure now pending in the American Congress. I was opposed to the measure. I had been written to about it by many constituents, and I had said that the measure was in committee, that I would give it careful consideration and earnest attention, as I was asked to do, and that when it came upon the floor of Congress, if I could vote for it I would do so. Senator WATSON had been written to about that measure, and he replied in an editorial in the Columbia Sentinel, his newspaper, in which he said to his people he thought the measure was absolutely wrong, that it was destructive of the rights of the States, and he wrote against it in the most able way. My constituents were not satisfied that I should discuss that measure on the floor of Congress when it came up for consideration and insisted that I must state as to how I should vote upon it. I then said that if that was the case, I was against the measure, and that I would do everything in my power to prevent its becoming a law.

When I went out through my district in South Carolina from stump to stump I read that editorial to those people, and I say now to his colleagues from Georgia that I believe in the rural districts of South Carolina he was as much beloved and as highly thought of and commanded as much respect as he did in his native State of Georgia. I read that editorial to my people, and everywhere I went they believed that if TOM WATSON was against that measure, if he had looked into it and considered it and believed it not to the interest of the South and the southern people whom he loved so much, it could not be good, it could not be entitled to their support. When the ballots were counted and I was elected I felt that I was under personal obligation to that able, splendid, Georgia Senator. It had been my intention to go to him personally and express to him my gratitude for what I considered he had done for me, but like many other things we put off, I did not have opportunity to avail myself of that pleasure. I was shocked when I saw that he had passed away, and when I heard that these ceremonies were to be held to-day I felt that it was my duty as a man to come here and to pay this humble tribute to his memory. It is absolutely sincere, it comes from the bottom of my heart, and if in the mysterious workings of Providence, in the unfathomable wisdom of God Almighty, it may be possible for that distinguished Senator to hear what I have to say to-day, he knows that I thank him for what I consider he did for me and for my people.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, we have assembled to-day for the purpose of paying tribute to a great Georgian. When the announcement of the death of Senator WATSON reached his native State, thousands were bowed down in grief; everywhere the expression was heard, "We have lost one of our greatest men."

The storms began to break early in his life. Born in the year 1856, just before the Civil War, in fairly good circumstances financially, he was, on account of the war and financial reverses, early thrown on his own resources, and here doubtless began the experiences which decided his destiny and mission in life. He knew what it meant to work on a farm for very small wages; to teach a country school; to walk to and from a country lawyer's office, carrying his lunch with him; to have few of the real necessities of life; to have a longing ambition for an education and no means by which to gratify it.

He succeeded in having two years in college, and was forced, for financial reasons, to leave. He then taught school and studied law at night, under adverse circumstances, but with that indomitable will and courage which was characteristic of his whole life.

All around him in his early manhood he saw poverty, distress, an oppressed and downtrodden people. Doubtless these things had a great deal to do with his future life, devoted to the interests of the poor, the weak, the needy, the helpless, the oppressed. It was said of him by one who knew him well: "By choice, by education, by inheritance, by environment, WATSON was the uncontrolled and uncontrollable tribune of the people. Born to dare for the people; to lead the people; to conquer for the people; and to die in the arms of popular love and righteousness."

His career was one of trial and struggle, of failure and success, of disappointment and achievement—all, as he believed, for the people and for the people's good. No storm ever turned back the onward feet of this man. No denial or disaster ever quenched the burning flame of his ambition. His disappointments were many. He often felt that he was mistreated, misjudged, misrepresented. I have no doubt he was. Yet he never swerved from the course he had selected.

He served one term in Congress. During that brief period he left his impress upon legislation of great benefit to that class of people to whom he had consecrated his life and his talents; in fact, to the benefit of all the people.

He was a candidate for reelection. It was one of the bitterest campaigns ever waged in Georgia. Enmities were engendered which were never completely healed; divisions among the people of his district which still exist to a large extent. It was and is still thought that he was elected by a majority of the qualified voters of the district, but he never obtained the certificate and was never seated. This he doubtless felt keenly. Who would not? It changed his entire course, but not the determination to carry on his work as he conceived it, in the interest of the people of his State. He simply pursued another but more enduring course, and one which brought to him his greatest fame and reputation—that of an historian. To this we are indebted for his "Life of Napoleon," his "Story of France," "The Life and Times of Andrew Jackson," "The Life of Thomas Jefferson," "Bethany, a Study and Story of the Old South," and his writings as an editor, in all of which was clearly shown his great storehouse of knowledge and ability, and through all of which, as I study his life, runs the one predominating thought and purpose, that he might be of service to those unable to help themselves, to serve humanity.

He was a great lawyer. It was necessary to hear him to fully realize his ability. As an advocate before a jury he had no equal. He was recognized as one of the best lawyers of his time.

There was another side to his life with which the public was not so well acquainted. He had strong, devoted friends and bitter enemies. He never shunned battle, and yet he was in his social life kind and tender, a gentleman, truly, of the old school. Judging from his writings, his thoughts turned often to the real things of life and the hereafter. May I here quote from an article denominated "The Late"?

Who are "The Late"? They are men who have acted their part and have left the stage. They are the dead.

I look over the list of "The Late", and I read the name of one I knew. Was he my foe? Was there enmity between us?

Alas, how pale and worthless the feud now appears. My passion is all gone. His white hand seems to wave me a flag of truce. Death obliterates his faults (if indeed they were his faults and not my prejudices), and I recall whatever was manly and strong and admirable in him. I review our differences, mourn over the estrangement, and grieve that malice ever arose between us. The way is so short, the time for joy so brief, human ills of the inevitable sort so numerous, that it seems to me now a supreme pity that we willfully added to the thorns which beset our journey.

Reader, some day our names will go into the columns of "The Late." The list is there and our names will be written into the blank, after a while.

To us it will not matter at all what the world may think, or may say when it reads our names in the list. We will be at rest then—so far as the world is concerned. Love can not reach us—nor malice, thank God! Misconstruction, envy, hatred, can hurt us no more. It matters not what the world will say, except in so far as the world speaks the truth.

While we lived, the false may have worked us enormous harm. It can never harm us again. The true will reign supreme.

How true are these words to-day. How short life is, and how foolish for one man to judge another harshly and go through life with envy, hatred, and malice against his fellow man.

He also had a high and exalted ideal of life itself. The only life that is worth the while of any man. Let him speak:

What, truly, is the life worth living?

It is to cultivate, expand, energize, and consecrate all that is best within you; to search for Truth and Right and to lay your willing sword at their feet; to combat all shams and hypocricies and superstitions and frauds and errors and oppressions; to love the best interests of your fellow man and to put your whole heart in the struggle for his advancement, in spite of his own cruel hatred and persecutions.

What though this life condemns you to unrequited labor, unappreciated effort, the ingratitude which cuts like a knife, and the misrepresentation which chills worse than the wintry wind? All this is outward, temporary, inconsequent, the mere passing of the fleeting clouds, nothing more than incidental discords on the great harp of life. Things like these wound, inflict pain, sadden the soul somewhat, but they do not change the course of the vessel nor make coward of him who stands sturdily at the wheel steering through the night by the everlasting stars. * * *

The life which is worth living has not always led to ease, worldly success, happiness, and earthly honor.

Too often the man who consecrates himself to the nobler purpose has been what the world called a failure, has been led away into captivity by pitiless foes, has died at the stake amid tortures. * * *

I have fought a good fight. Never once did I lower my flag. To the right, as God gave me to see it, I was always true. Not once did I bend the knee to the wrong, consciously.

All my life I fought for the betterment of humanity. Here are the scars to show it. Defeat has rolled over me, but not dishonor.

To no man or woman have I knowingly done hurt; if I have not done some good, it is not because I failed to try.

On millions of my fellow men I found the chains of bondage more galling than slavery; I did my utmost to show them how to be free.

Millions I found hungry, naked, homeless; I did my best to point the way out of poverty into plenty. * * *

Yea! I have fought a good fight. Here are the wounds. No white flag flew over my citadel. It held out to the last.

Loneliness pained but did not subdue me; persecution saddened but did not conquer me; friends deserted me and foes multiplied, but I was not utterly cast down. The sacred torch of human progress I held aloft, even as better men had done in the ages of the past.

Its light will not fail. Others will seize upon it and bear it on. Some day the night will pass, and the human race will no longer grope in the gloom.

In that my faith is strong. For that I have never ceased to watch and pray and work.

And now my part is done. The shadows gather about me—but I am not afraid. The voices from the darkness call for me—and without regret I go.

Beautiful language. High conception of the true and only life worth while. He undertook to fulfill that life according to his own convictions and in his own way so far as mortal man could. I am glad to quote his words here, for someone floundering around on the stormy sea of life may see it and gain new courage to fight on to the end.

He is dead, but his works still live and will grow in splendor as the days go by, and his life work judged without passion and prejudice, remembering the good he has done for humanity.

The passing away of a man of such ability and power was a loss to the Nation and to his own State and to that large class of people everywhere who trusted and followed him for so many years, through sunshine and shadow, through victory and defeat, even unto death.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, when a very small boy I read of TOM WATSON and longed for the time when I might see him and hear him speak. When the first opportunity presented itself I was delighted and heard him make a most eloquent and masterful argument in behalf of the South.

I later heard him make a great speech of a political nature in my home town of Douglas, Ga., and heard him next after he came to the Senate. One of my dreams as a boy was to see and hear some of the great men of the Nation. My fondest dreams have been fully realized by my being permitted to serve with them here in the Congress. Senator WATSON came to the Senate with more information than most Senators ever acquire and was recognized at once as one of the very best informed men in that august body.

His speeches were eloquent, logical, and persuasive in the extreme and always received the closest attention from those who differed with him as well as from those who agreed with him. Friend and foe admired his great information, his most excellent language, and his matchless eloquence. Even when a sick man, and scarcely able to stand, he ofttimes soared into the ethereal realm of eloquence and argued his cause with a force that appeared to be more than human.

To him, Thomas Jefferson was the ideal statesman. It is quite a coincidence that Senator WATSON, the great scholar and writer, should in many physical respects so closely resemble the great scholar and writer who wrote our Declaration of Independence. Very near the seat which Senator WATSON occupied in the Senate there hangs in the corridor of the Capitol a picture of Thomas Jefferson which is also a splendid picture of Senator WATSON. While walking near this picture one day with Senator WATSON, I said, "Senator, that picture of Thomas Jefferson is also a good picture of you." Senator WATSON smiled and replied, "Judge LANKFORD, several others have told me the same thing."

Senator WATSON was a hard worker. His service in the Senate was very probably shortened by his working here when most men, sick as he was, would have left off work altogether. Senator WATSON was active on the floor of the Senate the last day of the last regular session of Congress. This was four days before he died. Early in this his last day's service in the Senate he said:

I beg to make in one sentence the statement that when a vote was reached on the question as to whether the veto of the President of the soldiers' bonus bill should be overridden, I was struggling between life and death with asthma and had no chance to arrange a pair or to vote. Had I been present I would have voted to override that veto.

The silvery voice of Senator WATSON, which had been heard so often in behalf of the common people and which voice was so soon to be hushed by death, was the last voice to be heard in the proceedings of the Senate before final adjournment. His last words were against high-handed oppression and in behalf of some suffering, struggling miners and their families. He submitted and had printed in the RECORD several letters and clippings showing that some mine owners in Pennsylvania were unjustly turning some men, women, and children out of their homes. Senator WATSON was on duty to the last, "faithful to the end."

Senator WATSON loved the South and was ever ready to defend her and her people. On the 13th day of July, 1921, I heard him during a speech in the Senate make a most splendid reference to Gen. Robert E. Lee and to the Confederate soldiers buried in the cemetery at Arlington. He said:

You go out to Arlington, once the home of Robert E. Lee, who, as Theodore Roosevelt said, was the flower of Anglo-Saxon chivalry, the greatest soldier that our race ever produced, asleep in marble at Lexington, beside him the most splended of human swords—sleeping in marble at Lexington but living yet. Go to Arlington, and from the very time you enter the gates you are reminded, not of civilians but of heroes who fought battles on land and sea, which they thought were righteous, on the one side and on the other. Years ago it had been the custom there, Mr. President, to strew flowers only upon the Union graves. The men who had worn the gray slept beneath the sod with no roses and no lilies and no garlands upon their graves.

It thus happened on one Memorial Day that all the graves of Union soldiers were elaborately decorated with flowers, as was so natural to our friends of the North; and the southern graves of the "Rebels," if you please, had no flowers. During the night there came up out of the west the voice of the storm, the thunder rolled and the wind blew, and when the morning sun rose Providence had lifted those flowers and part of them rested impartially upon the graves of the Confederate dead.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to describe the eloquence of Senator WATSON or his wonderful power as a speaker. One of the best articles along this line was in the Observer, concerning a speech delivered by Mr. WATSON, at Newton, N. C., October 3, 1904. From this article is the following quotation:

Mr. THOMAS E. WATSON is not fairly represented in the pictures of him. He is not a large man, but of good proportions. He is well groomed and wears his clothes well. His face is full of healthful color. His jaws fit together firmly, and his sensitive red lips are expressive. He has that cut of nostril, thin and shapely, which sometimes means pride and always courage. His brownish yellow hair is thick and shocks over his forehead when he speaks. His eye is large and beautiful, and when he smiles the lower lid comes up and half conceals it.

He stood here to-day and spoke for an hour and a half, extemporaneously, and his language was classic and his thought as clear as sunshine. He is not a strenuous speaker, but the most persuasive, the most engaging and entertaining that I have ever heard.

The newspaper after quoting extensively from Mr. WATSON's speech said:

Mr. WATSON dwelt on the race question. His face wore a winning smile. His voice has a subtle quality, suggesting reserve power; and when he let it fall at his periods, there was something in it so sweet, so persuasive, that you can understand it only when you hear it. It seemed that he had extended his personality to his audience. While he was discussing straight political topics, making no effort at pathos or eloquence, I saw hundreds of eyes swimming in tears from no other cause than the mental excitement. I never saw people listen in this rapt way before. The little, quiet-mannered man stood there, making a few gestures, not often raising his voice to a high pitch, not a hint of perspiration about him, but his very calmness was the calmness of strength.

The Observer again quoted from Mr. WATSON's speech at length and then used the following quotation with the following comments:

When I (Mr. WATSON) stood up in Congress and advocated that the mails should be distributed to the country people I was laughed at. Now 40,000 men are employed in the rural-free delivery of mail, and $26,000,000 expended. I have offered to give $1,000—and I'm able to do it, thank God—to anyone who will show that I am not the originator of the rural-free delivery of mails.

He cited the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 17, 1893. No one can understand how impressive it was when he said, concluding this subject:

After I had been counted out and was not to be a Congressman any more, I remembered you; and now, since you have the opportunity, are you going to remember me?

He said this with his hands outstretched to the people. The beauty of it all was in the way in which it was said and done. There was not a ripple of applause, but tears were on many a cheek. It was the man's wonderful presence.

That was a splendid flight of oratory on the employment of children in factories. Now the South, with all its chivalry and humanity, winks at this thing, and the North, protecting its own children by statute, invests its capital in southern mills, where it can employ southern children.

"And we bow down to the Christ who loved little children, and have been taught to love Him because He cared for the helpless."

The scene at the close of this speech was remarkable. The people crowded about WATSON to shake his hand, and many of them were crying. There was no reason why they should be so moved, except that it was in the air. I have heard Bryan, Gunsaulus, the Dixons, and other great speakers, but this beat the band.

Several years ago John Temple Graves, in the Georgian, paid a most beautiful tribute to Senator WATSON. Among other things he said, speaking of Senator WATSON:

The publicist remains, leader of lost causes, focal of faction, and center of economic storms. He has fought his brave battle, with unbroken courage and with unfailing eloquence, to the armed armistice or to the predestined end. He has rebuked temptation, refused every compromise of principle, turned his back upon the glittering promises of office which were set for his return to the rank of the dominant faction, and with a consistency, pledged in sacrifice and maintained in heroic isolation, he has kept the faith of his advocacies and followed his convictions to successive stakes of martyrdom.

Through loneliness, misunderstanding, and misrepresentation, TOM WATSON has not faltered in fidelity to the cause and the people adopted as his own twelve years ago.

And he has rarely won. Never but once in his battle-scarred career has victory perched upon his banners or the flags of his faith over a triumphant field. His eloquence has been praised, his logic has been lauded, his consistency has been conceded, and his splendid courage has wrung tribute from his sternest foes. But by the world's standards, which are selfish and material, he must be measured as a defeated man—a baffled warrior—who has nearly always failed.

The defeated publicist—sitting for ten years desolate by his hearthstone—working out in solitude and patient honesty the strong convictions of his faith, goes forth with high courage and heroic zeal to fight. Great odds are piled against him. Slander stabs his name; scornful ridicule assails; money mocks his eloquence; friends fall away; comrades turn traitors in a night; bitterness blurs his battles; the ranks are hostile that were once his friends, and on the final field where he has staked and lost in dauntless sincerity his patriot sympathies and his brave beliefs, night falls in failure and darken in defeat.

But the patient publicist, struggling in darkness and defeat, has wrought like the tapestry weavers that work across the sea—worked on the wrong side, maybe, but worked for the right side aye. Parties that scorned him once are absorbing now his creeds; platforms that mocked him are marking his principles in planks that plead, and the people persuaded so often to defeat him and deny, are awaking at last to see that his warning was wisdom, and that his signal was the safety of the State.

Senator WATSON had many noble virtues which made him a great power in his State and Nation. One of his greatest virtues was his great love of people. He loved the folks and the folks loved him. No man without this great love could have spoken or written as he did. There is nothing in all literature truer or prettier than Senator WATSON's tribute to the country wife.

I told Senator WATSON one day that I wanted his permission to have this most splendid tribute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so I could mail it to the good people of my district. He said he would be glad for this to be done. Neither of us then thought he would die so soon and that I would use it as part of a memorial address on his life and service. I told Senator WATSON that his tribute to the country wife was appreciated very much by me, as it was such an accurate description of my own dear mother who has been dead these 18 years. He said he had his own mother in mind when he wrote it.

It is a most splendid description of thousands of good women in our country. No man without the greatest of love for the mothers of our Nation could have written it. Let me read it to you:

There are thousands of devoted and absolutely admirable wives and mothers in our cities, in our towns, and in our villages, and it gives me pleasure and pride to testify to the fact; but if you ask me to carry you to the home of the true wife and the true mother, one who loses herself entirely in the existence of her husband and children, one who is the first to rise in the morning, and the last to retire at night, one who is always at her post of duty, and the one who carries upon her shoulders the burdens of both husband and children, one who is keeper of the household and the good angel of it, utterly unselfish, happy in making others happy, with no thought of fashionable pleasure, perfectly content in quiet home life in which she does nobody harm and everybody much good, taking as many thorns as she can from the pathway of her husband and strewing it with as many roses as possible, strengthening him by her inspiration as he goes forward to fight the battle of life, smoothing the pillow upon which he rests his tired head when he comes home, tenderly rearing the boys and girls who will in turn go away from the door some day for the last time—the boy to become a good soldier in life's continuous warfare, and the girl to become some ardent suitor's wife and to be to him what her mother has been to her father; and who, when all toils are done and her strength is departing, will sit calmly in the doorway, watching the setting sun, with a serene smile upon her face, and never a fear in her heart—ask me to find where this woman lives, where this type is to be found, and I will make a bee line for the country.

Senator WATSON loved the country folks and they loved him. There is no prettier or truer tribute to the farmer in literature than Senator WATSON's "Planting Corn." The picture is so true of life. I can see my father now in the "Old Bay Field" plowing and us children dropping corn. It is a true picture of millions of farmers and their children planting corn. Here it is:

The bluebird was out to-day; out in his blossiest plumage, his throat gurgling with song.

For the sunlight was warm and radiant in all the South, and the coming of spring had laid its benediction on every field and hedge and forest.

The smell of newly ploughed ground mingled with the subtle incense of the yellow jasmine; and from every orchard a shower of the blossoms of peach and apple and pear was wafted into the yard and hung lovingly on the eaves and in the piazzas of the old homestead—the old and faded homestead.

Was there a cloud in all the sky? Not one, not one.

"Gee! Mule!!!"

"Dad blast your hide, why don't you gee-e-EE!!"

"Co-whack" goes the plowline on the back of the patient mule—the dignified upholder of mortgages, "time price" accounts, and the family credit, generally.

Down the furrow, and up the furrow, down to the woods, and up to the fence—there they go, the sturdy plowman and his much-enduring but indispensable mule.

For the poplar leaves are now as big as squirrel-ears, and it's "time to plant corn."

On moves the plowman, steady as a clock, silent and reflective.

Right after him comes the corn-dropper, dropping corn.

The grains fairly chink as the bare feet of the corn-dropper hurry past; and before the corn has well cuddled itself into the shoe-heel of the plowman's track, down comes the hoe of the "coverer" and then the seeds pass into the portals of the great unknown; the unknown of burial and of life renewed.

Peeping from the thicket near at hand the royal redbird makes note of what is going on, nor is the thrasher blind to the progress of the corn dropper. And seated with calm but watchful dignity on the highest pine in the thicket is the melancholy crow, sharpening his appetite with all the anticipated pleasures of simple larceny.

The mockingbird circles and swoops from tree to tree, and in his matchless bursts of varied song no cadance is wanting, no melody missed.

The hum of the bees is in the air; white butterflies, like snowflakes, fall down the light and lazily float away.

The robin lingers about the china tree, and the bluejay, lifting his plumed frontlet, picks a quarrel with every feathered acquaintance, and noisily asserts his grievances.

The joree has dived deeper into the thicket, and the festive sapsucker, he of the scarlet crest, begins to come to the front, inquisitive as to the location of the bugs and worms.

On such a day, such a cloudless, radiant, flower-sweetened day, the horseman slackens the rein as he rides through lanes and quiet fields, and he dares to dream that the children of God once loved each other.

On such a day one may dream that the time might come when they would do so again.

Rein in and stop, here on this high hill. Look north, look east, where the sun rises, look south, look west, where the sun sets—on all sides the steady mule, the steady plowman, and the children dropping corn.

Close the eye a moment and look at the picture fancy paints. Every field in Georgia is there, every field in the South is there. And in each the figures are the same—the steady mule and the steady man and the pattering feet of the children dropping corn.

In these furrows lies the food of the Republic; on these fields depend life and health and happiness.

Halt those children, and see how the cheek of the world would blanche at the thought of famine.

Paralyze that plowman—and see how national bankruptcy would shatter every city in the Union.

Dropping corn! A simple thing, you say.

And yet, as those white seeds rattle down to the sod and hide away for a season, it needs no peculiar strength of fancy to see a Jacob's ladder crowded with ascending blessings.

Scornfully, the railroad king would glance at these small teams in each small field; yet check those corndroppers and his cars would rot on the road and rust would devour the engines in the roundhouse. The banker would ride through those fields thinking only of his hoarded millions, nor would he ever startle himself with the thought that his millions would melt away in mist, were those tiny hands never more to be found dropping corn. The bondholder, proud in all the security of the untaxed receiver of other people's taxes, would see in these fields merely the industry from which he gathers tribute; it would never dawn on his mind that, without the opening of those furrows and the hurrying army of children dropping corn, his bond wouldn't be worth the paper it is written on.

Great is the might of this Republic!—great in its schools, churches, courts, legislatures; great in its towns and cities; great in its commerce; great in its manufactures; great in its colossal wealth.

But sweep from under it all these worn and wasted fields, strike into idleness or death the plowman, his wife and his child, and what becomes of the gorgeous structure whose foundation is his fields?

Halt the food growers, and what becomes of your gold and its "intrinsic value?"

How much of your gold can you eat?

How many of your diamonds will answer the need of a loaf?

But enough.

It is time to ride down the hill. The tinkle of the cowbell follows the sinking sun—both on the way home.

So, with many an unspoken thought, I ride homeward, thinking of those who plant the corn.

And hard indeed would be the heart that, knowing what these people do and bear and suffer, yet would not fashion this prayer to the favored of the Republic: "O rulers, lawmakers, soldiers, judges, bankers, merchants, editors, lawyers, doctors, preachers, bondholders! Be not so unmindful of the toil and misery of those who feed you!"

I never knew how much the people of Georgia and of the Nation loved Senator WATSON until his death. Millions loved him who had seen and heard him. They loved him best for they knew him best. Millions loved him who had never seen or heard him, but only knew of his great service to mankind. All were filled with real grief. They could not fully realize that he was gone and that no more would he be heard for them and theirs.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most solemn occasions of my life was when a few of his best friends and I, the night following his death, when all the rest of the world was quiet and seemed asleep, stood with bowed heads by his casket and looked into his upturned pale face. It seemed that those lips were ready to speak again and his face ready to glow again with the sympathetic radiance of life. But then I said, no it will not be so. He is dead, but he shall live again. He shall live in the memory of a grateful people as long as the human voice shall sing the praises of men. He shall live again beyond the stars.

The next day we started for Georgia to consign his body to mother earth in the State he loved so well. The deepest grief was everywhere. Thousands of people with bowed heads watched the funeral train as it passed. In Georgia there was a mightly multitude waiting to get a last glimpse of the man they loved so well. The very deepest grief was evident everywhere. By words and tears thousands of people evidenced the devotion of the people of Georgia and the Nation to the man who was being laid to rest.

Mr. Speaker, I am to-day, as a part of my eulogy on the life of Senator WATSON, reading in whole or in part a very few of his most excellent writings. Instead of trying to write a memorial of him I am pointing you to some of the monuments of which he is the author and finisher. He wrote his own memorials, which are imperishable.

Mr. Speaker, there are scenes in nature which the artist can not paint, and there are thoughts within the human breast which we can not express. The artist can not fully paint a picture of Niagara, the Yellowstone, the Canyon of the Colorado, or of the starry heavens. You ask me to tell you of a mother's love and I am dumb, I can not. I can only take you to where a child is suffering and let you see for yourself the anxiety, the pain, the suffering of the mother, and then you know dimly what a mother's love encompasses. You ask me to tell you of the beauties of nature. All I can do is to point to the wonderful works of nature by day and at night point toward the starry heavens. "The heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament showeth his handiwork." So it is with the achievements and writings of Senator WATSON. I can not tell you of them, I can only point to a few passages from his almost unlimited writings. To read his wonderful works is to live a new life in the garden of the world's best literature.

A new year has begun, my colleagues, since we saw Senator WATSON's body lowered into the grave at Thomson, Ga. Let us, the living, now read Senator WATSON's own prayer to Father Time as he felt the leading hand, and may we, in memory of our deceased friend, from our hearts utter the same prayer:

Oh, Father Time! We tremble as we feel you leading us toward the door of the New Year. Beyond that portal we can not see, and we dread it—as children dread the dark.

Deal gently with us in the New Year, Father Time.

Give us strength to bear the cross—for we know that we must bear it.

Give us courage for the battle, for we know that we must fight it.

Give us patience to endure, for we know that we shall need it.

Give us charity that thinks no evil, and which will stretch forth the helpful hand to lift our weaker brother out of the mire, rather than the cruel scorn which passes him by or thrusts him further down.

Give us faith in the right which no defeat can disturb, and no discouragement undermine.

Give us the love of truth which no temptation can seduce and no menace can intimidate.

Give us the fortitude which, through the cloud and the gloom and sorrow of apparent failure, can see the distant pinnacles upon which the everlasting sunlight rests.

Give us the pride which suffers no contamination, no compromise of self-respect, no willful desertion of honest conviction.

Give us the purpose that never turns and the hope that never dies. And, Father Time, should the New Year, into which you are taking us, have upon its calendar that day in which the few that love us shall be bowed down in sackcloth and ashes, let that day, like all other days, find us on duty—faithful to the end.

Senator WATSON died as he had wished and prayed to die. "on duty—faithful to the end." He was not afraid to die. He had an abiding faith which lifted him to the highest heavens of thought in this life and made him "glad to go" to that better land when he heard the call. Listen while I read from his own words how he felt about the efforts of mortal man, about a "loftier life," and about future estate of the human race:

Not quite can the painter's art transfer to canvas the beautiful scene which dwells in his mind.

Then whence came that beauty which is too perfect to be reproduced by human skill?

Not quite can the great composer put into melodious notes those harmonies that enraptured his soul.

Then whence came those harmonies, those celestial airs which inspired, yet somewhat eluded, the divine genius of Handel and Beethoven and Schubert and Mozart?

Not quite can the speaker or writer catch and cage, in spoken or written words, those sublime thoughts which came into his solitude, when all the outer world was still, and lifted his soul into a higher, purer, lovelier, diviner world.

Then whence came those thoughts which carried him to the mountain top and bade him look down upon all the world below?

From within comes the conviction that there must be somewhere a loftier life that we poor, imperfect creatures can live, and that somewhere there is perfect Beauty, perfect Melody, perfect Truth, and perfect Good.

From some better world must come these better things.

Some day it may be that the Angel of Beauty, which has so long inspired the artist, will whisper to him, "Put the brush away. Turn the canvas to the wall. Come with me." And that which is best in him will be glad to go.

Some day it may be that the Spirit of Music, which has been the companion soul of the composer, will say, "Sister spirit! Come away." And the twin souls will seek together the world in which there is no discordant sounds.

Some night the radiant thought that visits me here in my solitude may say to me—

"It is finished—Come." And that which is best in me will be glad to go.

To Senator WATSON life was a battle in which he was fighting for the right. "At Fifty" years of age he wrote:

Give me the man who will live and die for his ideals, who will surrender no righteous position without a struggle, who will perish rather than pollute his soul by apostasy from Right!

Better—a thousand times better—the tempest and the shipwreck with such a creed than inglorious decay at the wharf with any other. Better a Waterloo and a glorious death in the squares of the Old Guard than worldly pensions and honors for base betrayal of cause and country.

So I thought at twenty. So I think at fifty. I have the scars to show for it. And, like any other soldier of the wars, I am proud of them.

Let the tide ebb—it must be so; let the daylight fade, it must be so—but this much any poor mortal can do, and should do: Hold aloft, to the very last, the banner of your creed; fight for it as long as you can stand; and when you go down, let it be possible for you to say to those who love you: "Lay a sword on my coffin; for I, also, was a soldier in the great struggle for humanity."

Mr. Speaker, I think that there is nothing in all literature better than Senator WATSON's "Song of the Bar Room" and his companion apostrophe, the "Wine Cup."

Listen to the "Song of the Bar Room":

Alive, let us live. Where is Yesterday? Lost forever. Where's To-morrow? It may never come. To-day is here. Within its fleeting hours runs the only certainty that you'll ever know. Come, eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow you die!

The chains of self-restraint are galling—throw them off! The burden of duty is grievous—fling it down! The cross of responsibility is crushing—let another bear it!

Live for yourself: Live for the now: Live for the lust of living.

Drink! and forget dull care. Drink! and ease the heartache. Drink! and drown the passion for the unattainable.

See how men are drawn to me! My lights blaze a brilliant welcome; I am never too hot, nor too cold. Mirrored vanity smirks in my gilded reflectors; and no one is ill at ease, in my Free-for-all Club. No shrewish wife can tongue-lash you here; no peevish child annoy you with its cries. Leave to them the ugliness of your haggard home, and come unto me for comfort. Theirs, the cold and the gloom and the lonely vigil—yours, the warmth and glow and social joy.

Clink your glasses, men! Drink, again, "Here's hoping." 'Tis well to toast here, where begins the trail to the grave of Hope. Be jolly; let the place ring with laughter; relate the newest story—the story that matches the nude pictures on the wall.

What's that? A dispute, angry oaths, a violent quarrel, the crash of overturned chairs, the gleam of steel, the flash of guns, the stream of lifeblood, the groans of dying men?

Oh, well, it might have happened, anywhere. The hearts of mothers and fathers I wrench with pain; the souls of wives I darken in woe. I smite the mansion, and there are wounds that gold can not salve; the hut I invade, and poverty sinks into deeper pits.

I sow and I till, and I reap where I sow, and my harvest—is what?

Men so brutalized that all of humanity is lost, save the physical shape—men reeking with moral filth, stony of heart, bestial vice—men who hear the name of God with a wrathful stare, or a burst of scornful mirth; men listen to the death rattle of any victim of their greed or their lusts, without a sign of pity.

And the women, too! How can I fitly sing of the woman of my harvest time? Did you ever hear her laugh? It must be the favorite music of the damned. Did you ever hear her ribald talk? The very sewers might shrink at bearing it away. Have you ever heard her libidinous songs? Did you ever watch her eyes—those defiant, mocking, hopeless, shameless eyes?

What warriors have I not vanquished? What statesmen have I not laid low? How many a Burns and Poe have I not dragged down from ethereal heights? How many a Sidney Carton have I not made to weep for a wasted life? How many times have I caused the ermine to be drawn through the mud?

Strong am I—irresistibly strong.

Samsonlike, I strain at the foundations of character; and they come toppling down, in irremediable ruin. I am the cancer, beautiful to behold, and eating my remorseless way into the vitals of the world. I am the pestilence, stalking my victims to the cottage door and to the palace gate. No respecter of persons, I gloat over richly garbed victims no more than over the man of the blouse.

The church, I empty it; the jail, I fill it; the gallows, I feed it. From me and my blazing lights run straight the dark roads to the slums, to the prisons, to the bread lines, to the madhouse, to the potter's field.

I undo the work of the school. I cut the ground from under law and order. I'm the seed bed of poverty, vice, and crime. I'm the leper who buys toleration and who has not to cry "Unclean." I'm the licensed ally of sin. I buy from the State the right to lay dynamite under its foundations. For a price they give me the power to nullify the work of lawmakers, magistrates, and rulers. For a handful of gold I am granted letters of marque to sail every human sea and prey upon its lifeboats.

Huge battleships they build, casing them triply with hardened steel; and huge guns they mount on these floating ramparts, until a file of dreadnaughts line the coast—for what? To be ready for perils that may never come. But I give them a pitiful purse, and in return they issue me the lawful rights to unmask my batteries on every square; and my guns play upon humanity every day and every night of every year. And were my destroyers spread out upon the sea they would cover the face thereof.

Around that grief-bowed woman I threw the weeds of widowhood—but I paid for the chance to do it; and they who took my money knew that I would do it.

To the lips of that desolate child I brought the wail of the orphan—but I bought the right to do it; and they who sold me the right knew what would come of it.

Yes. I inflamed the murderer; I maddened the suicide; I made a brute of the husband; I made a diabolical hag out of the once beautiful girl; I made a criminal out of the once promising boy; I replaced sobriety and comfort by drunkenness and pauperism—but don't blame me; blame those from whom I purchased the legal right to do it.

No Roman emperor ever dragged at his chariot wheels, on the day of his triumph, such multitudes of captives as grace my train. Tamerlane's marches of devastation were as naught beside my steady advance over the conquered millions. The Cæsars and the Attilas come and go—comets whose advents mean death and destruction for a season; but I go on forever, and I take my ghastly toll from all that come to mill.

In civilization's ocean I am the builder of the coral reef on which the ship goes down; of its citadel, I'm the traitor who lets the enemy in; of its progress I'm the fetter and the clog; of its heaven I'm the hell.

Now let me read to you "The Wine Cup":

It is a warrior whom no victory can satisfy, no ruin satiate. It pauses at no Rubicon to consider, pitches no tents at nightfall, goes into no quarters for winter. It conquers amid the burning plains of the South, where the phalanx of Alexander halted in mutiny. It conquers amid the snowdrifts of the North, where the grand army of Napoleon found its winding sheet. Its monuments are in every burial ground. Its badges of triumph are the weeds which mourners wear. Its song of victory is the wail that was heard in Ramah: "Rachel crying for her children and weeping because they are not."

It never buries the hatchet; its temple of Janus never closes its doors. No dove of peace ever carries its message; in its hand is never the olive branch. It sends no flag of truce, and receives none; its wounded are left where they fall, and its dead bury their dead. Every citadel that it storms it devastates; and in every charge which it makes its cry is "No quarter."

Those who fall before its onset die deaths of shame, and they go down to dishonored graves to which love can bring no willing tribute of flowers, and over which pride can rear no enduring monument. To its prisoners it grants no exchange, holds them to no ransom, but clutches them fast, in a captivity that is worse than death, and which ends only at the grave.

The sword is mighty, and its bloody traces reach across time, from Nineveh to Gravelotte, from Marathon to Gettysburg. Yet mightier is its brother, the wine cup. I say "brother," and history says "brother." Castor and Pollux never fought together in more fraternal harmony. David and Jonathan never joined in more generous rivalry. Hand in hand, they have come down the centuries, and upon every scene of carnage, like vulture and shadow, they have met and feasted.

Yea; a pair of giants, but the greater is the wine cup. The sword has a scabbard, and is sheathed; has a conscience, and becomes glutted with havoc; has pity, and gives quarter to the vanquished. The wine cup has no scabbard and no conscience; its appetite is a cancer which grows as you feed it; to pity, it is deaf; to suffering, it is blind.

The sword is the lieutenant of death, but the wine cup is his captain; and if ever they come home to him from their wars, bring their trophies, boasting of their achievements, I can imagine that death, their master, will meet them with garlands and song, as the maidens of Judea met Saul and David. But as he numbers the victims of each, his pæan will be: "The sword is my Saul, who has slain his thousands; but the wine cup is my David, who has slain his tens of thousands."

Mr. Speaker, those of us living need more fortitude, and I am sure that Senator WATSON's suggestions on fortitude will encourage, not only us but those who shall read them, long, long after we, too, shall have passed away.

Do not be discouraged! Don't lose heart.

You may not be able to see the harvest where you have patiently sown the seed, but be assured of this; no seed is lost.

The truthful word manfully spoken, the earnest effort honestly made, the noble creed consistently held—these are things which do not perish; they live on and move the world and mold the destinies of men long after you are dust.

Leave cowardice to the cowards; leave servility to the slaves. Be a man—proud, though in homespun; free, though in a hut.

Own your own soul!

Dare to listen to your own heartbeat. Between you and God's sunlight let no shadow of fear fall.

What is there to live for, if you are never to think, never to speak, never to act, save as the echo of some master? Better the death of the brave than the long misery of the mental serf.

Not always is it easy to know the right—very often is the road rough. Human praise can be won by shorter routes. Honors and riches are not always its rewards. Pleasanter days and calmer nights may be yours, if you float smoothly down the tide of policy—steering deftly by the rules of the expedient.

But has life nothing loftier than this? Is there no divine voice within you that calls for better things? Is there no great pulse beat of duty within you—no flame of the warrior spirit, when insolent wrong filings its gage of battle at your feet?

Are you willing that the right shall call for aid, and you give no succor; that truth shall plead for help, and you bear no witness?

Is the sacred torch of liberty—passed on from hand to hand, down the ages in which brave men dared to keep it lit—to find you unwilling to hold it aloft?

Shall the temple of civic freedom, reared by the great men who are gone, stand vacant—calling mutely, calling vainly for votaries at the shrine?

Was it all a mockery—this long struggle your forefathers made for justice? Is it an idle tale—this story of the heroism with which the rights of the people were slowly won?

Not so—not so! Levity may slight and ignorance may disregard the blessed heirlooms of human endeavor, of patriotic purposes, of high-minded self-sacrifice—but they are there, and, like the signal fires of the highlands, they call heroic hearts to duty!

You may have desponded, but you must not despair. You may have stumbled, but you must not fall. You will rouse yourself and press forward. You will do your duty—for that is your religion.

If wrong triumphs, it shall not claim you as a partner in the crime.

If the light dies out in the homes of the people, the curse of the unhappy shall not blast your name.

You shall be a man—loyal, fearless, independent, ready for work, and loyal to the last, to the creed which your heart approves.

Men, like these—and no other—won every treasure in the storehouse of liberty, every jewel in the crown of good government, every thread in the golden tissue of religious and political freedom.

Men like these—and no other—are going to keep alive the sacred fires our fathers kindled, are going to stamp out the foul heresies that imperil our rights, are going to fight to the death those who would turn back the march of human happiness, and are going to rededicate this Government to the principles upon which it was founded!

Stand firm and fear not.

Brave men, who are nothing more than brave, rush into the combat, get worsted and quit.

Brave men, who are something more than brave, take no defeat as final.

Senator WATSON, like all great authors, soared aloft, eaglelike, into the higher and purer air, and saw visions not seen by the great mass of humanity. He wrote vividly what he saw. Those reading his masterful works see the pictures which he has drawn and marvel at the almost superhuman knowledge and vision of the artist who drew them. He indeed was one of the very greatest historians of all time. As a literary genius he ranks with the most noted. As an orator he thrilled his hearers with an eloquence which was sublime. He is physically dead, but his works and his life is a part of that which is immortal. I can not refrain from quoting again from Senator WATSON's own most splendid writings, where he commented upon a stanza of "Gray's Elegy":

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power;
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour:
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

I have often heard this stanza from "Gray's Elegy in a Country Churchyard" used for the purpose of discouraging ambition. In my judgment the poet had no such intention. He meant merely to give expression to that thought which the Romans had in mind when they placed in the chariot of the conqueror, on the day of his triumph, its attendant whose duty it was to repeat from time to time in the ear of the victor, "But remember that you are mortal." The same thought was in the mind of the Orientals, who dragged a mummy case through the banquet hall where revelers were feasting.

Properly understood, there is in all this no discouragement to honorable ambition. True, the paths of glory lead but to the grave, but whither leads any other path? The lawgiver, after all his toil and all the splendor of the civic crown, sinks to dust; but equally so does the thoughtless, aimless boor, who had no care beyond his pigsty.

The warrior, after the battles have been fought and won, after the dash of onset, the thrill of contest, the hot wine of triumph, sleeps coldly and alone; but equally dismal is the fate of the coward cur who wounded himself with an imaginary bullet, shirked the fight, and lived, the scorn of mankind.

There was once an Indian chief, celebrated in the mountains of North Georgia. Some one asked him the way to his home. The red man haughtily answered, "I go home along the mountain tops."

To each one of us comes the hour when we meet—

> "The shadow cloaked from head to foot,
> Who keeps the keys of all the creeds."

To me it seems far more noble, far more inspiring, to have the inevitable meeting somewhere in the pathway that leads us home along the mountain tops.

Senator WATSON lived in a realm of sublime creative thought on the vantage grounds of the highest peaks of the world's history and literature. He went as he had wished, home "Along the mountain tops." Yea, the very highest mountain tops which reach up to the skies where the lamps of the heavens brighten and make easier the pathway of the way-worn traveler. The transition from toil to rest was easy.

He had lived, loved, and wrote in the purest and highest ecstasies of thought which touch the mystic realms of the great unknown. It was a beautiful peaceful night when the earth is closest to heaven. In the silent hush which comes just before the dawn he reached out and grasped the hand of the Father and stepped across the narrow chasm which divides life from eternity, and heard from the Father of us all, the plaudit—

Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker—

The heights by some men reached and kept
Were not attained by single flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

These beautiful lines find splendid illustration in the remarkable career of THOMAS E. WATSON. In all our history it would be difficult to point to any great American in whose achievements the youth of the land may find deeper inspiration than in the life of the brilliant Georgian whose memory we honor to-day.

To arrive at a just estimation of the credit due him, it is necessary to consider the difficulties and obstacles which he had to overcome. His accomplishments are sufficient of their own merit to give him high place among the Nation's great men. But to do his name full justice it is necessary to contrast his accomplishments with his opportunities. His life throughout was one of arduous toil and self-reliance. The hardships and handicaps which he encountered find striking parallel in the case of the great Lincoln. With Senator WATSON, as with Lincoln, the obstacles of early life became mere stepping-stones and seem to have developed a sympathy for the poor and a devotion to the interests of the masses which became the guiding influence of a life devoted to their advancement.

At an early age, without necessary financial aid to pursue an education, with the responsibilities of a breadwinner thrust upon him, we find this red-headed boy at work on a farm at 50 cents a day. From the humble scenes and associations of simple farm life back in the hills of Georgia, a life of daily contact with farm hands, white and black, with no opportunities to make his way in the world save those carved by his own indomitable will and ambition, we see this farmer boy grow into the man of learning, enjoying the companionship of the greatest poets and philosophers of history. We see him master the world's classics—aye, more than that, the world's classics are enriched by his contributions, which will last as long as the English language shall be spoken. The backwoods country boy before reaching middle life is recognized as one of the world's great writers. Yet be it said to his credit that the glamor and glory of it all could never win his heart away from those to whom he had become attached in early youth. Through all his writing runs the vein of sympathy for them, the unabating effort to bridge the chasm between rich and poor and lead men to a recognition of brotherhood and equality.

I did not always agree with him. But I am glad to accept the invitation to speak on this occasion and to pay my tribute to this illustrious son of the South whose every heartbeat was loyal to her traditions and who spent his life in patriotic service of our common country.

Senator WATSON'S place as a writer is so unique that many who have been attracted by the brilliancy of his literary attainments seem not fully to appreciate his extraordinary achievements in other fields of endeavor. To become a successful lawyer is in itself enough to crown any man's career with success. Such a place is well worthy the life's effort of any man—such a reward is rich enough to compensate any amount of toil and endeavor. Senator WATSON was one of the country's really great lawyers. During the days of his struggles to obtain a college education, which was never completed, while teaching to obtain funds with which to prosecute his career at school, he took up the study of law, and at night burned his candle late, storing his mind with the fundamental principles of English jurisprudence. He laid well the foundations to which he always adhered, never falling into the evil of stopping with some decision or accepting as final some discovered precedent. His investigations were always exhaustive. He never reached a conclusion until prepared to fortify it by unanswerable reason. Soon after his admission to the bar his ability was recognized on every hand. His profound knowledge of the law and his remarkable gifts as an advocate created widespread demand for his services. His clientele at once extended throughout the entire State of Georgia. Always, after this, whenever it was found necessary to replenish his purse, so often wasted in political activity or public service, he had only to return to the practice of his profession to accumulate a comfortable fortune in a few brief years—and this, too, in a State where large accumulations of wealth are rare and where the fees of the lawyer are comparatively small. I would not be understood as attempting to measure his success as a lawyer solely by financial standards. That is only one of the elements by which to measure true success. It is said that Senator WATSON selected his cases and often refused to accept fees in instances which he regarded as unworthy of his efforts. On the other hand, no one was ever turned away because of poverty or obscurity. He sought always to use his splendid attainments in the promotion of justice and in service to his fellows.

But Senator WATSON had a love for mankind which made it impossible for him to rest content in the quietude of literary pursuits or the routine practice of law in the midst of wider opportunity for service. Too many problems affecting the masses pressed home for solution. In the presence of such conflicts and contending forces one of his restless nature and patriotic purpose could not remain passive or inactive. He had a love for the masses that was no less than a passion and an unyielding devotion to their interests and to every cause that lay close to their hearts or their welfare. He had unbounded faith in the right and capacity of the people to control their Government, and so long as this view was held in question nothing could swerve him from the purpose to accomplish its vindication. Politics to him was not a game to be played to obtain office or its emoluments. The appeal that allured him was the call to public service. Other things were mere incidents or means to be used to reach the higher end. He genuinely despised the ease and comfort, as he spurned the rewards, that attend the course of least resistance. He sought always a place on the firing line where he encountered hardships and often, I am sure, disappointments—but always his head was erect, his purpose fixed, and his spirit undaunted. Even political exile seemed only to deepen his faith, to strengthen his courage, and to increase his ardor. He let pass no opportunity to fight in any cause which he thought meant the betterment of the masses of mankind.

The plain people loved him with the same unyielding devotion with which he so gladly fought their battles. The people of Georgia loved and honored him to a degree not excelled in the case of any other illustrious son of that great Commonwealth. Probably in all the history of the State no such tribute was ever before paid one of her sons as was paid Senator WATSON by the thousands of toiling masses who swept into the little town of Thomson from every nook and corner of the State, many of whom, unable to obtain lodging, walked the streets or sat up all night awaiting the hour when they might look for the last time upon the silent face of their lamented chieftain. Not only in his beloved State of Georgia, but throughout the length and breadth of the land where dwell the men whose toil creates the wealth of this mighty Nation this man was loved and honored. They followed him when living, and now that he is gone they cherish his memory in lasting gratitude and affection.

Happy, indeed, the dispensation of Providence which permitted this devoted public servant to live to enjoy in some measure the rewards that come of unselfish service for the masses and to realize at least a partial fruition of his hopes and labors for their betterment. Not only was he called to the highest position within the gift of the people of Georgia but he lived to see the cause of those for whom he fought held in different regard by those in charge of their Government.

The principles penned by his hand and promulgated in ridicule and derision as populistic vagaries have been accepted as wise and beneficent by many of the leaders of the two great political parties, and their author triumphantly chosen to a seat in the Senate of the United States. The plan originated by him for the daily delivery of mail to the men about their daily toil has been accomplished. The masses have reached a higher degree of education and enlightenment. Improved methods of transportation have brought healthier and happier social and economic conditions throughout the land. The demand for financial reform, sneered at back in the nineties, has been met by the establishment of banking facilities which give the average citizen an opportunity in the struggle for industrial supremacy unknown in former years.

Farmers of the Nation, with new hope in their hearts and new light in their eyes, have caught step to the music of a better and a brighter day. He had only to look about him to behold on every hand the splendid fruits of his patriotic public service and a future bright with the promise of ever-widening prosperity and happiness.

Senator WATSON was a pioneer in every struggle in recent years that has brought relief to the masses of mankind. He was of heroic mold. He lived and died fighting for the uplift of his fellows. His great learning, his masterly oratorical gifts, his rare courage, lofty patriotism, and labor for the common good give him place as one of the outstanding statesmen of our great Republic.

It is not gold, but only men
Can make a people great and strong.
Men who, for truth and honor's sake,
Stand fast and suffer long;
Brave men who work while others sleep,
Who dare while others fly,
These build a nation's pillars deep
And lift them to the sky.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to speak of the great attainments of the late Senator from Georgia, the Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON, because his character and abilities have already been beautifully and eloquently portrayed by his colleagues both in the House and the Senate. But I shall speak of him as a lawyer for the reason that Members of the Senate and the House have often asked me if Senator WATSON succeeded as well at the bar as on the hustings.

I knew him well as a lawyer, because I practiced law in the courts of our own State with him. To say that he was a good lawyer would not begin to do him justice, because he was one of the best, if not the very best, trial lawyer I have ever met in the courts. He was an advocate of marvelous ability and if he had the conclusion before a jury his logic and eloquence were simply irresistible. He rarely ever lost a case before a jury, and I have seen him try quite a number. And he did not depend alone upon his powers of speech, for no lawyer prepared his cases better than Mr. WATSON. I have been associated with him in the trial of several cases and have observed the care with which he prepared every detail. He was not satisfied with knowing the law, but he wanted to know, and did know, all the facts and details of every case. If the cause were one in which oral evidence alone was involved he would talk to each and every witness and question him closely and minutely in regard to every phase of the transaction. And when the case was sounded for trial Mr. WATSON was always ready and well prepared. He rarely made any notes, but carried everything in his marvelous memory.

The county of Scraven, my home county, was the scene of Senator WATSON'S early activities. It was there he taught his first school during vacation while attending college at Mercer University, and the old log house where he taught a country school at Goloid stood for a number of years until it rotted down from sheer decay. In fact, it remained standing until a few years ago, and when strangers came along the road near where the old building stood it was pointed out to them as an object of interest and curiosity, because Mr. WATSON labored there, while yet in his teens, within its humble walls.

He had loyal friends everywhere, but there were none more loyal and loving than those in Scraven County, where he made them while a young man struggling to obtain an education.

I was at my home in Scraven County when the death of Senator WATSON was announced from Washington, and it made one sad to witness the expressions of sorrow and bereavement depicted in the faces of his host of friends when they learned of his death.

He loved his friends and they worshiped him with a devotion that was truly wonderful. No man in Georgia ever had a more powerful, personal following than Senator WATSON. His followers grew from a small band in the early '90's until he was justly regarded at the time of his death as the strongest political factor the State has ever produced.

Senator WATSON had many and marvelous gifts. He was a lawyer of rare ability, a statesman with a national reputation, a historian of preeminent authority, a man of broad culture and wide information, a devoted husband, a loving father, and a loyal friend. No words of praise from his colleagues can add to his renown, and he has left in the hearts and affections of his people a monument that will last forever.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House: "History has furnished but one perfect example" declared the eloquent J. C. C. Black in beginning his memorable speech at the unveiling of the Ben Hill monument in Atlanta; but the pages of history shine with the names and the deeds of men whose notable achievements have been at once the legacy and the inspiration of mankind. We have met to-day beneath the dome of this historic Capitol in the Capital of the proudest and happiest Nation on earth to pay tribute to a man—a scholar, a statesman—whose outstanding ability and whose remarkable versatility gave his name and his books an honored place in the libraries of two continents, and carried him to the shining pinnacle of the highest elective office, save one, in the United States of America.

THOMAS E. WATSON was humanly human, and therefore he was not a perfect man. His very humanity made thousands love him more. But any impartial study of notable men of notable achievements must admit that there was something tremendously unusual and notably worthy that caused this typical American boy of humble birth to so mightily grip the hearts of the masses that more than 10,000 people journeyed to his funeral in the now famous little town of Thomson, Ga.—people who followed him in life as "the Stormy Petrel of Georgia politics"—some in reverence, some in awe, some in reasoning sequence, some in blind and unreasoning devotion, but all with an unmatched enthusiasm—for they believed, somehow, that "Tom" WATSON was the friend and fearless champion of the "common man."

I saw those thousands that memorable September day—stunned, saddened, silent—wounded, wondering, weeping—feeling that one of their own number, one of their closest friends or relatives, even one of their family circle, had been called by God, leaving a vacant chair, an empty throne, which no other could ever fill.

A memorial address in a sacred hour like this is a good place for frankness and honesty; it is certainly not a place for other than honesty; and in that spirit of frankness which THOMAS E. WATSON would himself approve, I must say that I did not indorse some things which Mr. WATSON did, nor some measures for which he stood; and frankly, again, I am quite sure he did not indorse some things I did and some measures for which I stood; but we were personal friends, each recognizing the right and the duty of the other to think honestly and act fearlessly before the bar of personal conscience and political action.

In the brief compass of this memorial tribute, in which so many friends and colleagues join, it is manifestly impossible to record or even refer to many of Senator WATSON'S notable achievements; but to me, far more than the fact that he was one time the nominee for Vice President, and then the nominee for President by a national convention of political pathfinders, two things stand out above all others among his pioneer constructive efforts—his initial steps toward that great, beneficent legislation in behalf of the American farmer, rural free delivery, and his authorship of the antiliquor plank in the Populist platform of 1896.

Professor Arnett, of Columbia University, in his book, "The Populist Movement in Georgia," records that the Populists came out for prohibition in that year, and that Mr. WATSON, their acknowledged leader, wrote their platform demand for prohibition.

The masses were not ready for it then, but such pioneer declarations helped to blaze the trail for the "White Ribbon" legions who finally marched to constitutional victory. While a Member of Congress from the tenth district of Georgia in 1892, Mr. WATSON had already startled the country by his revelations concerning the barroom in the Capitol—the beginning of the fight which finally drove that insidious den of drink and shame from beneath the Capitol dome, and serving as a prohibition object lesson to the whole country, for the people naturally reasoned that if the debauching saloon was not fit for lawmakers in the National Capitol building, then surely it was not fit for the youth of America who would some day be the lawmakers or the lawbreakers of the Nation.

Leading Georgia papers declared at the time that the brilliant young representative of the tenth Georgia district had suffered the fate of practically all reformers—that he had lost all his influence in Congress by trying to bring about such a radical change in the habits and customs of recognized leaders. Henry Grady said:

All reforms are born through doubt and suspicion, but back of them, as back of the coming sun, stands the Lord God Almighty.

While naturally, of course, many would have rejoiced to see Senator WATSON more vigorous toward the enactment and enforcement of the Federal amendment, we rejoice to remember that the distinguished world historian, whose first public speech was an appeal for temperance, left to history one of the most graphic and powerful arraignments of "The Wine Cup" and "The Song of the Bar Room" in all literature. Every young man, every young woman, in America—yea, in the world—who is tempted to "look on the wine when it is red" and plunge into the debauching fascinations of bacchanalian revelry ought to read these brilliant and immortal warnings:

THE WINE CUP.

By THOMAS E. WATSON.

It is a warrior whom no victory can satisfy, no ruin satiate. It pauses at no Rubicon to consider, pitches no tent at nightfall, goes into no quarters for winter. It conquers amid the burning plains of the South, where the phalanx of Alexander halted in mutiny. It conquers amid the snowdrifts of the North, where the grand army of Napoleon found its winding sheet. Its monuments are in every burial ground. Its badges of triumph are the weeds which mourners wear. Its song of victory is the wail that was heard in Ramah: "Rachel crying for her children and weeping because they are not."

It never buries the hatchet; its temple of Janus never closes its doors. No dove of peace ever carries its message; in its hand is never the olive branch. It sends no flag of truce, and receives none; its wounded are left where they fall, and its dead bury their dead. Every citadel that it storms, it devastates; and, in every charge which it makes its cry is, "No quarter."

Those who fall before its onset die deaths of shame; and they go down to dishonored graves to which love can bring no willing tribute of flowers, and over which pride can rear no enduring monument. To its prisoners it grants no exchange, holds them to no ransom, but clutches them fast in a captivity that is worse than death, and which ends only at the grave.

The sword is mighty, and its bloody traces reach across time, from Ninevah to Gravelotte, from Marathon to Gettysburg. Yet mightier is its brother, the wine cup. I say "brother," and history says "brother." Castor and Pollux never fought together in more fraternal harmony. David and Jonathan never joined in more generous rivalry. Hand in hand, they have come down the centuries, and upon every scene of carnage, like vulture and shadow, they have met and feasted.

Yea; a pair of giants, but the greater is the wine cup. The sword has a scabbard, and is sheathed; has a conscience, and becomes glutted with havoc; has pity, and gives quarter to the vanquished. The wine cup has no scabbard and no conscience, its appetite is a cancer which grows as you feed it; to pity, it is deaf; to suffering, it is blind.

The sword is the lieutenant of death, but the wine cup is his captain; and if ever they come home to him from their wars, bringing their trophies, boasting of their achievements, I can imagine that death, their master, will meet them with garlands and song, as the maidens of Judea met Saul and David. But as he numbers the victims of each, his pæan will be: "The sword is my Saul, who has slain his thousands; but the wine cup is my David, who has slain his tens of thousands."

THE SONG OF THE BAR ROOM.

(By THOS. E. WATSON.)

Alive, let us live. Where is Yesterday? Lost forever. Where's To-morrow? It may never come. To-day is here. Within its fleeting hours, runs the only certainty that you'll ever know. Come! eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow you die!

The chains of Self-restraint are galling—throw them off! The burden of Duty is grievous—fling it down! The cross of Responsibility is crushing—let another bear it!

Live for yourself: live for the Now: live for the lust of living.

Drink! and forget dull Care! and ease the heartache. Drink! and drown the passion for the unattainable.

See how men are drawn to me! My lights blaze a brilliant welcome: I am never too hot nor too cold. Mirrored Vanity smirks in my gilded reflectors; and no one is ill at ease in my Free-for-all Club. No shrewish wife can tongue-lash you here; no peevish child annoy you with its cries. Leave to them the ugliness of your haggard home and come unto me for comfort. Theirs, the cold and gloom and the lonely vigil—yours, the warmth and glow and social joy.

Clink your glasses, men! Drink again, "Here's hoping." 'Tis well to toast her here, where begins the trail to the grave of Hope. Be jolly; let the place ring with laughter: relate the newest story—the story that matches the nude pictures on the wall.

What's that? A dispute, angry oaths, a violent quarrel, the crash of overturned chairs, the gleam of steel, the flash of guns, the stream of life-blood, the groans of dying men?

Oh, well, it might have happened anywhere. The hearts of mothers and fathers I wrench with pain; the souls of wives I darken with woe. I smite the mansion and there are wounds that gold can not salve; the hut I invade, and poverty sinks into deeper pits.

I sow and I till, and I reap where I sow, and my harvest—is what? Men so brutalized that all of humanity is lost, save the physical shape—men reeking with moral filth, stony of heart, bestial in vice—men who hear the name of God with a wrathful stare or a burst of scornful mirth; men who listen to the death rattle of any victim of their greed or their lusts without a sign of pity.

And the women, too. How can I fitly sing of the woman of my harvest time? Did you ever hear her laugh? It must be the favorite music of the damned. Did you ever hear her ribald talk? The very sewers might shrink at bearing it away. Have you ever heard her libidinous songs? Did you ever watch her eyes—those defiant, mocking, hopeless, shameless eyes?

What warriors have I not vanquished? What statesmen have I not laid low? How many a Burns and Poe have I not dragged down from ethereal heights? How many a Sidney Carton have I not made to weep for a wasted life? How many times have I caused the ermine to be drawn through the mud?

Strong am I—irresistibly strong.

Samson-like, I strain at the foundations of character; and they come toppling down, in irremediable ruin. I am the cancer, beautiful to behold, and eating my remorseless way into the vitals of the world. I am the pestilence, stalking my victims to the cottage door and the palace gate. No respecter of persons, I gloat over richly-garbed victims no more than over the man of the blouse.

The church, I empty it; the jail, I fill it; the gallows, I feed it. From me and my blazing lights run straight the dark roads to the slums, to the prisons, to the bread lines, to the madhouse, to the potter's field.

I undo the work of the school. I cut the ground from under law and order. I'm the seed bed of poverty, vice, and crime. I'm the leper who buys toleration, and who has not to cry "Unclean." I'm the licensed ally of sin. I buy from the State the right to lay dynamite under its foundations. For a price they give me the right to nullify the work of lawmakers, magistrates, and rulers. For a handful of gold I am granted letters of marque, to sail every human sea and prey upon its lifeboats.

Huge battleships they build, casing them triply with hardened steel; and huge guns they mount on these floating ramparts, until a file of dreadnoughts line the coast—for what? To be ready for perils that may never come. But I give them a pitiful purse; and, in return, they issue to me the lawful right to unmask my batteries on every square; and my guns play upon humanity every day and every night of every year. And were my destroyers spread out upon the sea they would cover the face thereof.

Around that grief-bowed woman I threw the weeds of widowhood—but I paid for the chance to do it; and they who took my money knew that I would do it.

To the lips of that desolate child I brought the wail of the orphan—but I bought the right to do it; and they who sold me the right knew what would come of it.

Yes! I inflamed the murdered: I maddened the suicide: I made a brute of the husband: I made a diabolical hag out of the once beautiful girl: I made a criminal out of the once promising boy: I replaced sobriety and comfort by drunkenness and pauperism—but don't blame me; blame those from whom I purchased the legal right to do it.

No Roman Emperor ever dragged at his chariot wheels on the day of his triumph such multitudes of captives as grace my train. Tamerlane's marches of devastation were as naught beside my steady advance over the conquered millions. The Cæsars and the Attilas come and go—comets whose advent means death and destruction, for a season: but I go on forever, and I take my ghastly toll from all that come to mill.

In civilization's ocean I am the builder of the coral reef on which the ship goes down: of its citadel, I'm the traitor who lets the enemy in: of its progress, I'm the fetter and the clog: of its heaven, I'm the hell.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

Conducting the funeral of Senator WATSON, Dr. E. J. Forrester, the profound Bible scholar and Baptist preacher, who was the favorite pastor of the brilliant Georgian, brought out the fact that Senator WATSON, who united with the Baptist Church in his youth, loved the simplicities and verities of "old-time religion," and such old-time songs as "How Firm a Foundation" and "On Jordan's Stormy Banks I Stand," and that he believed what everybody knew he believed—in that fundamental Americanism which Roger Williams taught—the absolute separation of church and state, liberty of conscience and freedom of soul. His brilliant advocacy of these basic constitutional truths was like a blazing fire consuming everything before it that dared to touch the public treasury for sectarian purposes or dispute the supremacy of the American flag on the American continent.

HE COULD WEEP AS WELL AS FIGHT.

It was hard for many who only thought of him in the heat of fierce political conflict to realize that "TOM" WATSON, the fighting warrior of the hustings, had an intensely human heart that could obey the Biblical injunction to "weep with those who weep."

It was not merely the personal gratitude of one stricken family that learned that beautiful truth just after the Knickerbocker tragedy here in Washington, and not merely in his native Georgia were thousands moved to tears by his thoughtful, brilliant, tender words, but widely over America millions were touched and blessed when he had read before the Senate of the United States that beautiful editorial from the Washington Star entitled "Carolyn Upshaw," and addressing himself especially to the brave, striking words of faith and triumph, "Well, sister, I haven't cried yet," that fell from the smiling lips of that suffering, dying Christian girl of 16 years, Senator WATSON melted the hearts of listening Senators and a listening Nation by his wonderful words of pathos, beauty, and immortal truth.

Thank God for the mission and the ministry of human tenderness and Christian sympathy!

E'en sorrow touched by love grows bright
With more than rapture's ray,
As darkness shows us worlds of light
We never saw by day!

Senator WATSON wrote me one time in response to my letter of sympathy when his beloved daughter died: "I have almost reached the limit of the men of my line, and I want to die at peace with all mankind." And one day when I sat near him in the Senate while a fellow Senator was making a bitter speech toward certain politicians, the tempestuous leader of many a stormy battle turned and gently said to me:

It is a pity for a political leader to indulge in bitterness. I realize that I have made a mistake to find myself so often breasting the waves of the current and harboring and using bitter speech. I feel the new responsibility of being a Senator upon me and I want to represent, not a bitter feud, but all the people of Georgia.

It is highly gratifying to Senator WATSON's nation-wide circle of friends that his editorial ideals and potential activities did not stop with his untimely death, but that his paper, The Columbia Sentinel, is now being carried on by his former confidental secretary, Hon. Grover C. Edmonson, as the resourceful editor, and by that remarkably brilliant Georgia woman, Mrs. Alice Louise Lytle, as managing editor, who served in that capacity something like a dozen years during the life and labors of "The Chief," as his close associates affectionately called him.

Better than any other two persons of equal ability on earth, they are capable of lifting aloft the torch he carried so long, and projecting into the future those fundamental principles of militant Jeffersonian democracy for which THOMAS E. WATSON so fearlessly and brilliantly stood. It is especially fortunate for the cause of sobriety that, in consonance with the spirit of the first public utterance of their "Chief" in his brilliant youth, The Columbia Sentinel is firing a broadside every week in behalf of the integrity of the Constitution and the strict enforcement of our prohibition law.

Victor, indeed, is that builder of states and nations who lived strongly enough to project his ideals beyond the touch of his own master hand and plant the seed—truths of a shining pyramid of light that will pierce the ages as they over it roll.

Do dreams of fame thy restless soul engage?
With sword or pen thou canst inscribe thy name
Upon the brow of Envious Time himself
And bid defiance to his blighting breath;
But thou must first build 'round thy human heart
An adamantine wall, impregnable alike
To Love's sweet smile or Pity's tear,
On the altar of thy purposes lay
Freedom and ease and rest and calm content—
The joys of home, hope, happiness, and Heaven;
And when thou'st reached the lonely mountain top
And stand at sunset by the glittering thing
For which thou'st left the peaceful vale below,
Thou'lt find the brightness that had lured thee on
Above the dear companionship of men
Was but a mocking gleam of chilling light
Reflected from some bleak and icy cliff
That frowns above eternal fields of snow.

These lofty words by Tom F. McBeath, one of the South's most gifted poets and educators, describes the melancholy fate, the lonely isolation, of many a son of fame who has lost the "common touch" by climbing above and away from the masses of men and women, but THOMAS E. WATSON carried the plain people with him to the heights, realizing that they and their clinging love and faith had placed him there, and he accepted that faith and love as the gift and the call of duty and of God.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SAMUEL M. BRINSON.

Mr. STEDMAN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the additional special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. ABERNETHY, by unanimous consent—
Ordered, That Sunday, February 11, 1923, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. SAMUEL M. BRINSON, late a Representative from the State of North Carolina.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to send forward a resolution and ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 524.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that an opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. SAMUEL M. BRINSON, late a Member of the House from the State of North Carolina.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of the exercises of the day shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of the resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, we speak of those who have departed as if they were swept out of existence. It is difficult to conceive that they have simply changed relations. We speak of the sun at evening as gone. It has only faded from our sight, to shed its light on some other part of the world. We speak of the ship, as it gradually sinks from sight, as gone. It is just plowing its way across waters deep to find, ere many days, another harbor. Our friend whose memory we honor to-day has gone to find rest in another harbor, to live in another realm and in a changed existence.

There is no death; what seems so is transition.
This life of mortal is but the suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portals we call death.

My distinguished predecessor, SAMUEL MITCHELL BRINSON, was born at New Bern, N. C., on March 20, 1870. He was the son of William George and Kittie (Chestnut) Brinson. His father was an honored citizen of Craven County and held positions of high trust in the county. SAMUEL M. BRINSON was educated in the public schools and at Wake Forest College, where he graduated A. B. in 1891. After his graduation he taught school for a year and then took the law course at the University of North Carolina, and was admitted to the bar in 1896 and began to practice at New Bern. In 1902 Mr. BRINSON was elected superintendent of public instruction for Craven County, and for more than 15 years he directed and supervised the county school system and built up for Craven County a system of schools the equal of any in the State. He soon became a prominent factor in school matters in the State and was a member of the executive committee of the North Carolina Teachers' Assembly and a trustee of the Eastern Carolina Training School at Greenville and a trustee of Meridith College at Raleigh.

Mr. BRINSON was elected to the Sixty-sixth Congress in November, 1918, and took his seat on March 4, 1919. He was reelected as a member of the Sixty-seventh Congress in November, 1920, and died April 13, 1922. Mr. BRINSON was a 32 degree Scottish Rite Mason, a member of Sudan Temple of the Mystic Shrine and was affiliated with the Royal Arcanum in which he was Supreme Guide. He was a deacon in the Baptist Church. Mr. BRINSON was married to Miss Ruth Martin Scales, of Salisbury, N. C., January 16, 1901. His wife died on January 19, 1919, while he was a member of Congress. They have one daughter, Miss Mary Steele Brinson. During the last few years of his life Mr. BRINSON was a terrible sufferer from illness. No one but he and God will ever know the suffering which he underwent.

We are told that all pain, sickness, weariness, distress and agony of body is to be treated reverently. Every sorrow is a billow in the world's troublesome sea, which we must pass over on the cross to bear us nearer home. The cloud forms, drops its rain, and passes away for the sun to shine and the flower to bloom. The storm gathers, purifies the air and passes away for the fragrant and healthful calm to settle like a benediction on the land. Affliction comes, and passes away for peace, joy, and glory to appear. When one passes under the shadow of the Cross of Calvary, he knows that through this shadow lies the passage to the great white throne. It is said of Michael Angelo, as he hewed away at his marble, he would watch the chips fall under the heavy strokes of his mallet, and would say "As the marble wastes the image grows." God's ways in his providences are incomprehensible, but through affliction and sorrow we may exclaim, "God is making us."

And may we say of our friend whose memory we honor that it is our fervent prayer that in the evening of his life, when the golden clouds rested sweetly and invitingly upon the golden mountains, and the light of heaven streamed down through the gathering mists of death, that he had a peaceful and abundant entrance into the world of blessedness, where the great riddle of life unfolded to him in the quick consciousness of a redeemed and purified existence.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to my friends from North Carolina for the honor they do me in inviting me to be present and participate in these memorial exercises in honor of our departed colleague, who those of us who knew him generally respected so highly and those who knew him intimately loved so much. It is not improper that some Representative from Tennessee should participate in these exercises because the history of Tennessee is inseparably intertwined with that of North Carolina. The territory which is embraced in the State of Tennessee was embraced in the grant by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Walter Raleigh and in the subsequent grants by Charles II to the Lords Proprietary of the Carolinas.

As early as 1772 the people of what is known in history as the Watauga Settlement met and drew up certain articles of government, which were the first articles drawn by any body west of the Alleghenies that might be denominated self-governing articles. But the State of North Carolina subsequently asserted and maintained, by peaceful methods, its sovereignty over that section. I do not know just why the Watauga articles were drawn, except perhaps that it was due to the fact that the settlers at Watauga came from other States in the main rather than from North Carolina. At any rate, in 1784, North Carolina passed an act of cession, anticipating the act of Virginia. By this act what is now Tennessee was ceded to Virginia, but for some reason the Federal Government did not accept it; and some two years later there was formed the State of Franklin.

This had a stormy career. It was never recognized by North Carolina and of course was never recognized by the Federal Government; and in 1790 North Carolina passed a second act of cession, ceding what is now Tennessee to the Federal Government, and this cession was accepted. So that Tennessee comes from North Carolina.

There are other reasons why a Tennesseean should be invited to participate in this memorial service. Two, at least, of the Presidents of the United States who were citizens of Tennessee were natives of North Carolina. Polk was born in Mecklenburg County, and Johnson was born in the county in which Raleigh is situated. Where Jackson was born, of course, we do not know. There has always been a contest between gentlemen from North Carolina and gentlemen from South Carolina over that question. If he was born in North Carolina, then North Carolina has furnished three Presidents by way of Tennessee. If he was born in South Carolina, then South Carolina is in the happy condition of being able to quote the words put in the mouth of a lioness by some writer on natural history, in the story with which you are familiar. During a truce among the animals the mothers met in order to show their progeny. The fox showed a number of babies. Other animals showed a number, and finally the fox said to the lioness, "How many can you show?" And the lioness said, "I can show only one, but look you well at it; it is a lion's cub."

Another reason why perhaps it is not improper that I was invited to participate is the extremely friendly relation always existing between the North Carolina delegation and myself. Ever since I have been here North Carolina has had a leading place in the affairs of the Nation. It was true long before I came here; it will be true long after I am gone from here. Among those from North Carolina with whom I have been associated was our departed colleague, Mr. BRINSON.

I can not say that I knew him intimately, but I knew him most pleasantly. He was in ill health during much of the time that he served here. He was unable to give to his service all the activity that he would have liked to give, but within the limits of his work he maintained in highest degree the fine traditions and splendid spirit of North Carolina; and that is saying much.

He was a well-educated man. He made one address here which I remember very well indeed, which was notable in character. When the reapportionment bill was presented from the Committee on the Census, of which he was a member, he felt that in a way the institutions and practices of his State had been attacked, and he made a speech which was exhaustive from the legal standpoint and from the broader standpoint of social necessity and of the rights of a sovereign State.

He was a very loyal man. He was loyal to duty; he was loyal to his State. He was proud of the honor that had been conferred upon him. He did all that he could to measure up to his responsibilities, and he measured well. He was an educator before he came here. He had a well-trained mind. His diction was clean and clear always. His impulses were fine. He was of gentle spirit, tender in heart. He rendered great service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD] is recognized.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the beautiful custom which the Congress has followed through all its history of convening in special session, the public business laid aside, to give the Members an opportunity to say a word to the memory of those of their friends and favorites of the membership who may have been called away forever by the death angel during the term, has been called into exercise with fearful, almost shocking, frequency during the Sixty-seventh Congress. My State has been called to share with the others and our thoughts are now turned to the fondly cherished recollections of the late SAMUEL M. BRINSON, late a Representative from the third district of North Carolina. He came first to the Sixty-sixth Congress with but little experience of the larger affairs, so called, of public life and politics, coming first into public notice for valued and conspicuous service in the cause of public education in North Carolina 20 years ago, as soon as political peace was restored from the struggle that brought forth the suffrage amendment to the constitution of that State and its activities were embraced with a strong and universal enthusiasm throughout the State.

Mr. BRINSON lived in a large county whose suffering had been long and patient, and in the revival of its activities and the putting on of its new labors he was called to its support and continued to serve as the chief officer and leading proponent of that work in his county until his election to Congress in 1918. His heart and head and hand were enlisted as one who loved his work, for he loved humanity and sought always to lift it up. He loved children and loved to contemplate their possibilities, and saw in education the only hope and chance for the fullness of those possibilities.

His devotion to this service and unstinted qualifications produced efficiency that attracted attention from a distance, and he was called into service as an advocate to other parts of the State. The people saw in this service and this advocacy his unselfish nature, his freedom from demagogy, his high degree of capacity, and his genuine broad-gauged devotion to them and their children, and for these qualities and these causes they called him to a supposed higher service and more conspicuous honors, a service in the Congress of the Nation.

This call, coming as it did for this cause and in recognition of such an order of public service, may, I think, be said to be a larger compliment, so to speak, than that which frequently comes on account of political service and party zeal. Many calls to high public service come as expressions of necessary recognition to partisan activities and sacrifice. This probably is as it should be, but when an intelligent and patriotic electorate turn away from the active fields of politics and look for servants whose merit is tested by their closer touch with the fundamentals of life, the hearthstone cares and hopes and aspirations of homes where fathers and mothers pray and struggle and children are born and reared and take on the duties of life, it is, I think, a stronger expression of public confidence and affection and a prouder monument, a happier heritage—

A heritage it seems to me
A king might wish to hold in fee.

This is exactly what Mr. BRINSON's election to Congress meant, and he well deserved it. Yet, by that, I do not mean to indicate that he was lacking in party interest and loyalty, for he was not. He believed in his party as the best agency for the service of the people whose interests and welfare he loved, but he had not been as active as many men in his district in its behalf.

Firm as adamant in his party alignment and in all his connections, he had no heart for hate and no spirit narrow enough for intolerance. In the short time I served with him in the House I many times sat by him among the thin ranks of the Democratic side and heard him comment on the Members of the opposite side of the House, then strangers to me, as they rose to speak, and he always reserved something kind, complimentary, and generous to say—indeed he had the habit and disposition of speaking kindly of everybody.

And this, Mr. Speaker, I think is the delicate, accurate, and supreme test of human character—to speak generously of others in their absence. One who speaks generously thinks generously, and one who thinks generously of others has the fullness of human excellence, so far as it is given to human character to possess it.

I heard one of his campaign speeches in 1920, when he had a sharp campaign on for his nomination. Truth, candor, and absence of self-laudation, and a sincere interest in the public welfare were manifest in every utterance of his plain honest speech. He was as free from demagogy as a saint from heresy. It was not in him to deceive or mislead anybody for any cause or end, and the people as they stood round about him seemed so to estimate him. He would have made them a devoted and most valuable public servant in the Congress if he had been longer spared, for he "came out from among them," knew their needs, felt their impulses, shared their difficulties, bore with them their burdens, and rejoiced with them in their successes. In their churches and schools he was their faithful helper and leader, and his election to Congress was his direct reward from them of this devotion and service. In his death a splendid, useful, noble life has come to its lamented end. As the forest puts on its brightest robe to die in, so does such a life robe itself in its tints of eternal beauty as its sunset hour approaches.

When he last left these halls he knew he was going, not to return, but his bearing plainly showed that the shadows as they gathered brought no terror to his peaceful, quiet soul, but rather a glow of promise, pointing toward the dawn of the eternal morning. He went undisturbed to his home, where first he met his pastor as he fell back on his wearied couch and said, "It is all right."

A delegation of Members of the Congress from both Houses attended the funeral. I was among them. His friends packed the beautiful, spacious church, and as I marked their deep emotion, their wonderful floral tributes, and moved among them around the open grave and on the streets, I knew their affection would better guard his tomb and longer preserve his memory than the cold shaft of marble that stands above his grave. His beloved minister, the Rev. W. A. Ayers, spoke with deep emotion and striking eloquence. They were affectionate friends, but he spoke as knowing he had lost him but for awhile.

Knowing that I would be doing Mr. BRINSON's will and pleasure, if the dead could know the action of the living, I sought lately to obtain from Mr. Ayers a copy of his remarks, but he had not preserved them, and all I have is an extract taken from a local newspaper. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that it be printed as an extension of my own remarks and in the same type.

THE FUNERAL SERVICE HELD OVER THE REMAINS OF HON. S. M. BRINSON, AT THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, NEW BERN, N. C.—HUNDREDS ASSEMBLE TO PAY CONGRESSMAN BRINSON TRIBUTE.—FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH WAS CROWDED WITH FRIENDS OF MR. BRINSON.—SCORES WERE UNABLE TO GAIN ADMISSION TO THE CHURCH WHEN THE SERVICES STARTED.—SPLENDID TRIBUTE.—EULOGY DELIVERED BY REV. W. A. AYERS WAS AN IMPRESSIVE TESTIMONIAL.

Mr. Ayers began by saying:

Our text to-day is Psalms 37:37: Mark the perfect man, and behold upright: for the end of that man is peace.

I find myself unable to pay fitting tribute to our departed brother, first, because his death has been such a shock to me personally. My own heart is filled with uncontrollable emotion. And second, because no man could hope to do justice to this splendid character who has passed to the great beyond. Hence in this hour we must turn to the word of divine inspiration to find a fitting tribute—

"Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace."

S. M. BRINSON was marked for distinction from his birth, coming of a long line of noble ancestry. His mother belonged to the South's old-time aristocracy. She was the very soul of honor and the law of kindness was on her lips. Yielding himself to Christ and the ideals of christianity early in life, S. M. BRINSON translated his religion into terms of daily conduct. His religion came first. He was never too busy to give time to the work of his church. For 20 years he served as our church clerk. He also served as a member of the board of deacons and as Sunday school superintendent. He never slighted any duty placed on him by the church.

As an educator S. M. BRINSON was competent, efficient, and faithful. It was in this field that the greatest work of his life was performed.

For 17 years he was superintendent of public instruction in Craven County. It was through his efforts that our schools have gained a State-wide reputation for excellence; yes, a reputation that has extended throughout the entire Southland. A movement is now on among the school children of the county to raise funds for the erection of a monument to the memory of him who loved them so well and labored for them so faithfully.

As a statesman, S. M. BRINSON was the embodiment of integrity and honor. His broad information gave him a wonderful grasp on the needs of the hour, and with unsoiled hands he stood only for the things of righteousness. His soul loathed double-dealing as a thing of darkness. I have talked with many of his colleagues in Washington on various occasions, and on every hand I have heard nothing but the highest praise for him. He was recognized as one of the most promising younger Members of the House.

This was the man, my friends, to whom we would pay honor to-day. How well he bears out those words of David: "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace." Peace has come to S. M. BRINSON; a peace that surpasses all understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS] is recognized.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, the invitation of the North Carolina delegation to participate in these memorial exercises is deeply appreciated and is one I sincerely welcome.

Throughout the service in Congress of our late colleague, SAMUEL M. BRINSON, Representative from the third district of North Carolina, I was rather closely associated with him, both in the House and particularly on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which he was the ranking minority member at the time of his death, April 13, 1922. An uncompromising Democrat, a man of high principles, a faithful and devoted public servant, he won for himself in his brief congressional career the friendship, confidence, and esteem of his associates, and gave to his constituency a full measure of splendid and honorable service.

Unassuming and gentle in manner, but unswerving and positive in character, he brought to his labors not only a deep interest in national problems which he was called upon to face and help solve for the best interests of all, but also knowledge and ability, with a conscientious consideration and appreciation of the views and opinions of others.

A fidelity and loyalty to the highest ideals and standards of duty characterized and made conspicuous his congressional service in spite of the long and discouraging illness which prevented him in the latter part of his second term from the same degree of active participation in congressional work which had previously marked his comparatively brief career.

Those of his colleagues who knew him even longer and more intimately than I did have given a recital of how he rose, through successive steps in public office, to representation of his constituency and the State of North Carolina in the Congress of the United States.

The story of his success will, no doubt, furnish inspiration to many another patriotic and ambitious young American, and will contribute its share of encouragement to those who are also faced with difficulties and obstacles, but whose courage and determination prove sufficient to the accomplishment which they seek.

SAMUEL M. BRINSON has left to those of his family who survive a rich heritage. And in this expression of regard and esteem for our late colleague and associate I tender to his family and loved ones the sympathy of the membership of the House of Representatives and a sincere and devout wish for their welfare.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] is recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, our late colleague, Hon. SAMUEL M. BRINSON, whose life and public services we to-day commemorate, was elected as a Representative in Congress from the third district of North Carolina at the November election, 1918, and reelected in the November election, 1920, serving through the Sixty-sixth Congress and during the Sixty-seventh Congress until his death on April 13, 1922, making a little more than three years that he was an honored and useful Member of this body.

Before his election to Congress he was a practicing attorney in his home town of New Bern, N. C., and also served as superintendent of public instruction of his native county of Craven for 17 years, from March, 1902, to March 4, 1919, the date on which he began his services as a Member of Congress. As head of the educational forces of his county he rendered a most useful service and made a reputation which doubtless had much to do with his being called to a wider field of usefulness and service.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. BRINSON began with the opening session of the Sixty-sixth Congress and soon grew into a strong and binding friendship which extended until the day of his death.

I was honored by the Speaker of the House in being appointed a member of the committee to accompany the remains of our friend and colleague to his home, the place where he was born and had spent his useful life—New Bern, N. C. It was an ideal spring day on April 14 when the last formal services were held in the church of which he was a faithful and consecrated member. A large concourse of people coming from all over North Carolina attended the funeral, showing the very high esteem in which Mr. BRINSON was held by the people of his native State.

The church of which he was a member was packed with sorrowing friends to pay a tribute of regard and love to their deceased friend. His pastor chose for a text the following words from the Thirty-seventh Psalm, thirty-seventh verse: "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace"—from which he delivered a very adequate and appropriate discourse, portraying beautifully the life work and noble character of the deceased.

As a Member of Congress Mr. BRINSON rose rapidly, and early in his first term gave definite promise of becoming one of its most useful Members. However, early in his service here in Congress it became apparent to his colleagues that he was suffering from a serious and what soon proved to be an incurable malady. He bore his affliction patiently and uncomplainingly. He was taken off by the mysterious hand of death when it seemed a still brighter career of usefulness was just opening and his life's work was but partly done. Why he was thus caught by the strange hand of fate and his life's work suddenly ended is more than we are able to comprehend.

The high ideals, the noble deeds, and the pure, upright life of SAMUEL M. BRINSON speak more eloquently of his great service to his State and Nation than any words that can be uttered or written by his admiring, sorrowing friends. A truly great man, a faithful servant of the people, has passed to the realm of the beyond. Of such as was our worthy deceased colleague it has been truly said by the inspired writer: "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] is recognized.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the roll of the Sixty-sixth Congress contained for the first time the name of SAMUEL MITCHELL BRINSON, whose life and public service we commemorate to-day.

At the beginning of the session he was assigned to a committee of which I was already a member. We served together on the committee until the date of his death; were intimate friends almost from the date of our acquaintance; and hence my opportunity for judging as to his capacity, disposition, and character. Mr. Speaker, I am therefore pleased to have the opportunity of speaking a few words of eulogy on this occasion.

He had served the people of his native State in public capacity for many years before he became a Member of Congress, and it was upon the efficiency of this service that he became a Member of this House. He was both by temperament and mental training well equipped for service here. While he died in the meridian of manhood, yet his life was filled with achievements. His native ability and genial nature made many warm friends for him in this House, but the condition of his health and his short duration of service may have prevented opportunity for making that lasting impress upon the country at large which his capacity warranted and most surely would have resulted had he lived and enjoyed a reasonable degree of health.

He was a positive character and possessed an analytical mind; hence he usually reached a correct conclusion easily and quickly. He was tolerant and respected the opinions of others, yet the course which he pursued was always the result of his own judgment. While he was modest in disposition he never hesitated to express his opinion when necessary.

Mr. Speaker, to me both life and death is a mystery; but after all, it is not the fact that a man has lived or that a man is dead that counts. It is, rather, how did he live? How did he die? Of SAMUEL BRINSON we may always truly say, he played his part in the world of men, and the Great Critic will hold it good.

The night dew that falls,
Though in silence it weeps,
Shall brighten with verdure
The grave where he sleeps;
And the tear that we shed,
Though in silence it rolls,
Shall long keep his memory
Green in our souls.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LYON] is recognized.

Mr. LYON. Mr. Speaker, it is a beautiful custom that makes it possible for the colleagues of a deceased Member to meet together and hold memorial services for their departed friend, thereby placing on permanent record their testimonal of the worth of him who has crossed over the river. It may be that in some services of this kind the dead Member's past life was not such as to merit all of the spoken eulogies, but those who knew SAMUEL M. BRINSON know that his life was so clean, his character so beautiful, as to justify anything we can say here to-day.

I did not meet "SAM" BRINSON until I came to Washington in April, 1921. At that time he was a great sufferer from the disease that finally resulted in his death, but in spite of his suffering, which he bore with patience and resignation, he was companionable, anxious to advise and counsel with his friends, and remained so far as his strength would permit at his post of duty, serving with ability the people of his district, whom he loved so well.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who attended his funeral in the city of New Bern were everlastingly impressed with the fact that the entire city joined in sincerely mourning their friend. I have never seen such genuine sorrow over the death of any man as was depicted on the faces of the thousands who attended his funeral. No man can win and hold the love, honor, and respect of the entire community in which he lived like "SAM" BRINSON did who had not lived a life of service and self-sacrifice. And this he did, for he was a generous, warm hearted, Christian gentleman, and we, his friends and colleagues, feel keenly his loss.

Mr. Speaker, our hearts go out in sympathy to his young daughter, who is left motherless and fatherless. May the Great Architect of the universe comfort her and watch over her in the years to come.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER] is recognized.

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Speaker, SAMUEL M. BRINSON possessed in an unusual degree those principles and virtues essential to the most useful career. With a hatred for all kinds of shams, hypocrisy, fraud, and deceit and a love of truth and loyalty to convictions, with courage that never permitted him to swerve from his devotion to the highest ideals which were part and parcel of his very nature, he was a prince among men. His studious and industrious habits with a well trained and educated mind equipped him well for a successful field of endeavor in the learned professions, statecraft, and politics.

There was none of the dramatic in his make-up. His was a modest and retiring disposition, with a firmness of character and with a fixed purpose to do the right thing in all his actions and dealings with his fellow man, with no effort at sparkling wit, humor, or repartee. He was good natured, kind, and gentle, possessing the calm demeanor of the scholarly gentleman without the slightest air of pedantry or superiority which sometimes is associated with those superior minds who control the destiny of communities and States and dominate in various fields of human endeavor.

The political history of North Carolina might be written without a great deal about the activities of our lamented departed colleague, but the educational history of the State would lack much in completeness without a record of his achievements in the great battle for the education of all the people at public expense, first led by Aycock, McIver, Alderman, and others.

Mr. BRINSON was one of those who aided greatly in placing his State in the forefront in its public institutions of learning and the elevation of its public schools to the place they occupy to-day, for last year there were expended for public education nearly $30,000,000, and approximately the same amount for the building and improvements of a State system of hard surfaced roads, in addition to the very large expenditures by counties in this southern Commonwealth of which he was one of the builders in its educational rejuvenation and reconstruction.

While I knew nothing of Mr. BRINSON until he left college and was an active force in the educational affairs of the State, living as I do some 200 miles from his home, nor do I know whether his early life was one in which he had to contend with a thorny, rough, and rocky pathway, as most men in my State, born as he was, near the close of the Civil War, and for several years thereafter, for in North Carolina, as in other southern States, there were in those days bitter years of stress and turmoil, hardships, and difficulties well nigh insurmountable across the pathway of those who fought to get an education and climb the road which leads to usefulness and at times to fame and fortune.

Mr. Speaker, it matters not what his opportunities were in the formative period of early life, we pause not to inquire, for the fact is that his life demonstrates that he was one of the finest types of southern civilization.

He had those virtues which distinguish the truly great.

After the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress convened it was my good fortune to know Mr. BRINSON intimately, for his apartment was next to mine and I saw him and conversed with him daily. In addition to a well-trained, clear, analytical mind, stored with almost inexhaustible information on various subjects and a grasp of public questions which he discussed most intelligently, he was a most interesting and valuable friend and associate.

In conclusion permit me to state that the outstanding characteristic of this good man, in my opinion, was that he could be depended upon. He was truthful and honest in all things. He could be measured by the same yardstick in his private as well as in his public life. He regarded not only a money promise as sacred but a political promise as well.

Stronger and stronger each day SAMUEL M. BRINSON grew in the confidence of his friends and the public. His death was a distinctive loss to the State and to the country which he loved so devotedly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, we have set apart this hour to pay fitting tribute to the life, character, and services of SAMUEL M. BRINSON, late a Representative from North Carolina. I did not have the privilege of becoming as closely acquainted with our late colleague as did some of his associates in service, and, therefore, can not extol as well as they the many intimate excellencies of his nature and sweetness of his life outside of this Chamber. My contact with him and my observation of his qualities were confined to his activities on this floor, and of that, in just candor, I am restrained to speak.

Mr. BRINSON was the Representative of a fine constituency. I say this because soon after his death I had occasion to visit among them. Not possessing unusual attributes either of virtue or distinction, but all of the sturdy, dependable, and amiable qualities of a fine cross section of the American people—and that is as high a eulogy as can be pronounced. Among these people SAMUEL M. BRINSON had his origin, and in the midst of them he was nurtured. By their high standards of probity and duty his character was molded and his ambition fired, and by them he was honored with a high station in public life, and at its end was mingled back again with his ancestral soil amidst the lamentations of his bereaved constituency.

He practiced the great profession of the law for a few years, but the greater portion of his life was devoted to the still greater duties of public instruction. The man who during a long reach of years, with fidelity and consecration assumes as the champion of the youth of his community to battle against ignorance, and sloth, and error, and superstition, and impiety—to set burning in the hearts of the young the flames of higher aspirations and more exalted virtues—has performed a public service which happily does not die when he expires, but extends on and ever on in the widening cycles of the lives and characters of those who endure after he has departed.

His service in Congress was brief. His advent to his duties here was shadowed with a great sorrow, for only a few weeks before assuming his place here as the culmination of his life's ambition, his devoted wife "was beckoned by the pallid messenger with the inverted torch to depart." In the pall of so great a grief SAM BRINSON, although about to sit in the councils of State, no doubt exclaimed, "vanitas, vanitatum omnia vanitas."

Mr. BRINSON was an earnest man, but not austere. Frivolity had no part in his nature, but he was nevertheless amiable and generous in his emotions.

He was meticulous in reaching conclusions upon public questions because his desire was to be a wise and conservative legislator. He sought always to reflect the good of his people in his public expression. Not given to much declamation, he was rather a listener, as most wise men are, hoping to garner some truth and some philosophy out of the millions of platitudes uttered in this Chamber. But his vote always registered his judgment, for he was no panderer amongst men. Our late colleague acquired, as he deserved, the universal respect and admiration of his associates in service, and his untimely death was to all of us a source of very sincere regret.

I know nothing of the spiritual side of his nature, but remembering as I do the resolute goodness of his countenance, the calm light that lay in his eye, I can well believe that as the twilight shadows of the last hour fell upon him, even as an honest plowman of the field, when his day's work is done, can reflect that he has paid to toil its full toll, so did this man of whom we speak look back upon his career among men and find it in his heart to say: "I have done my work; I have plowed a straight furrow."

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the average reader of the daily newspaper gets the impression that service in Congress is simply one of ease and personal comfort. The contrary is the fact. In most cases the services rendered are of the most strenuous kind, taxing the physical strength of the Members to its greatest limit. Few realize the number of matters to which each individual Member must give his personal attention and careful consideration. Constituents expect favorable results. Members endeavor in every possible way to make anticipations become realizations. Nearly every Member of the House finds that when his term has expired that he is richer in experience, but poorer in the pocket. He has made many sacrifices for the honor of being a Member of Congress and he appreciates having had the great privilege of having served in the greatest legislative body on the face of the earth. No wonder then that since the Great War, with its heavy strain on the mental and physical strength of the membership of Congress, the toll which it has had to pay has been exceptionally large. The colleagues of a departed Member know these facts better than the outside world. They know very well that the hardest work in Congress is performed in committee rooms. Mr. BRINSON was a member of the Committee on the Census, of which I have the honor to be chairman. In considering the number of representatives to make up the future House the question of relationship of the white and the negro in the State of North Carolina frequently came up for discussion. Mr. BRINSON took keen delight in telling his colleagues how his State was making a herculean effort to educate the negro, and at the same time giving him the opportunity of exercising his suffrage. He was always courteous in his treatment of his fellow Members on the committee, and at all times was ready and willing to carefully listen to what others had to say. He had served his State and country well. He had taught in the public schools.

In that way he had done his full share toward helping the little acorns learn how to become the future oaks of the Republic. He had endeavored in every way to instill in the minds of the youngsters under his charge that not only must patriotic service be rendered in times of war, but an equal service must be rendered during the times of peace. He recognized, as all of us know, that the future of the Republic depended upon the rising generation being taught that with all the benefits and opportunities of American citizenship there came the duty and obligation to serve it at all times to the best of one's ability. Had he been spared, he undoubtedly in time would have become one of the most influential Members of the House. The custom has been established in Congress of setting aside a day on which Members pay their last tributes to those of their Members who have passed to the far beyond while in the service. Men of faith do not fear death. They are firm in their belief in immortality. They know that when the infant is born, he comes into this world usually with a cry. He is passing from darkness into light. We all know that tender hands are ready to receive him and give him every care. With this knowledge in mind men go to meet their Maker, realizing that they will receive at His hands the same tender care and consideration which the infant receives when he first arrives at the hands of those who are near and dear to him. So, while we pay this tribute to our dear departed friend and Member, we do so more for the sake of the living rather than for the honored dead, for his record of loyal and devoted patriotic public service to his State and Nation needs no tribute at the hands of man. Well may we repeat the words of the psalmist—

> Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him:
> I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.
> He shall call upon me, and I will answer him;
> I will be with him in trouble:
> I will deliver him, and honor him.
> With long life will I satisfy him,
> And show him my salvation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEAVER] is recognized.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, we have come to-day to speak of the life, character, and service of a most distinguished son of North Carolina. At the time of his death he was one of our beloved colleagues in this House. It is not my purpose to attempt any fulsome flattery of him, but only to express in a few words, and as best I can, something of his great service to his State as well as my own personal regard and esteem for the man.

SAMUEL M. BRINSON was a native son of North Carolina. He was born at New Bern in that State and continuously resided there until his death. In church affiliations he was a Baptist. He graduated from Wake Forest College, with distinction, in 1891. He then taught school in the city of New Bern. In 1895 he studied law at the University of North Carolina and in 1896 was admitted to the bar of that State. He practiced his profession with ability and much success. His intellectual grasp early and easily ranked him among the best lawyers of his section.

In 1902, having become interested in public education, he became superintendent of public instruction of Craven County, in which the city of New Bern is situated. This office he filled with singular fidelity and acknowledged ability for a period of 17 years. During those years of his young manhood, with great energy and enthusiastic love of his work, he applied himself to the duties of this office. It brought him in close contact with the schools. It engendered a great interest in the young men and women of his county and his State, and he became endeared to the people of every class and of all conditions of life.

Recognizing the splendid talents and character of this man, realizing his force of character and intellect, the people of the congressional district in which he resided in 1918 elected him to the House of Representatives for the Sixty-sixth Congress. In him they had a Representative who was attentive to their wants, industrious in his habits, and who had a grasp of all great public questions.

He was reelected in November, 1920, to the Sixty-seventh Congress, and it was during the period of this Congress that, after a long and tedious illness, death came to him. It brought sorrow to his colleagues and to all who knew him here and at home. It has always seemed to me especially sad that death should have come to him just as he was beginning what undoubtedly would have been a splendid career in Congress. But we realize that for all of us somewhere along the path of life the shadow sits and waits.

This brief statement of his life does not express the intellectual and moral power of Mr. BRINSON. It does, however, most clearly point to the fact that he was at all times, from early manhood, a power, a factor, and a vital force in the life and progress of his community and State. He brought to his duties as a Representative in Congress a ripe experience and a high order of intellect, and, what is more than this, a character and texture of soul so splendid and so fine that he immediately impressed himself upon all of those who came in personal contact with him. He early demonstrated his ability to become a most useful and highly esteemed Member of this House.

His appointment as a member of the great Committee on Education was a most fitting one. Mr. BRINSON was an enthusiast in this great cause. He had given of the best years of his life to promoting education in his county and his State. His heart was there. He had served his home people for years in extending the operation of their schools. He had fought and worked for education throughout North Carolina and he had lived to see his beloved State, with unparalleled progress, move forward in this great cause. He had seen the light of knowledge come to quicken the lives and strengthen the character of the children and young men and young women of his section and State. Much of this progress was due to his ability and his untiring energy. He had followed the course of education and had seen its advantages exemplified from the district country schools to the high schools and the great universities and colleges, and had seen that from thorough education, power would come into the life of his State.

He had been promoted, at the time of his death, to services in a wider field and to a theater of broader action. He was eager to take his part in promoting education from a national standpoint and to the fullest extent that the National Government might justly and properly cooperate with the States in this great enterprise. He was much interested in pending legislation that would dignify the cause of education and that would guarantee more fully, as he thought, to every child of the Nation the right to become an educated and helpful man or woman. I know that this matter was engaging the attention of this splendid man, when for some strange and unfathomable reason he was called to the great beyond. To lose him was to lose much in this great work.

He is gone from the field,
He is lost to the forest,
Like a summer dried fount,
When our need was the sorest.

During his brief service in Congress he had, however, given much attention to other important matters. As a member of the Committee on the Census he labored long and hard over the details of a reapportionment bill. He was always active and earnest and filled with a desire for true accomplishment.

Mr. BRINSON was of a very solid texture. He wished to do things that were worth while, and he did them. He lived in an exceptionally clear moral atmosphere. Life to him was more than a mere playing to the galleries. His desire was "To be, rather than to seem." In whatever capacity he touched the lives of his fellow man he was always helpful and wholesome. No sense of egotism directed his heart and brain. His convictions, when formed, were strong and enduring, and yet he was by no means intolerant of the opinion of those with whom he might find himself in opposition. He was ready to contend for what he thought was right, without condemnation, however, of others with whom he disagreed.

He was married in 1901 to Miss Ruth M. Scales, of Salisbury, N. C. They lived most happily together and were blessed with one splendid daughter. It was to me one of the saddest of incidents that, after the people of his section had chosen him to represent them in Congress—in November, 1918—that a few months later his wife should have been taken from him by death. She had shared with him their many trials and had helped him to grow into a splendid manhood. Eager for his future advancement, it was particularly sad that she was not to enjoy his further honors with him. To him the death of his wife was a crushing blow.

It was my sad privilege to attend his funeral at New Bern in April, 1922. I noted that he had erected a beautiful monument above the last resting place of her who had been his earliest mate. He now sleeps beside her. I have been told by one who knew him that in the days immediately preceding his death he was often seen rereading the letters she had sent him. He knew that she was waiting for his coming, and I doubt not that a feeling of nearness to her was resting upon him and that he had, indeed, said within himself:

I can not feel that thou are far,
Since near at hand the angels are;
And when the sunset gates unbar,
Shall I not see thee waiting stand,
And, white against the evening star,
The welcome of thy beckoning hand?

He made a noble fight against the disease that was to terminate his useful life. At times he thought he had won, and in his conversation with his colleagues he was most hopeful; but at last he began to feel that it was a losing fight, but he believed in the resurrection and the life beyond, and as he drew nearer to the great and final event he saw the welcome of the beckoning hand of his beloved wife. All that is mortal of him sleeps by her side in the beautiful cemetery at New Bern, but I doubt not the immortal reunion that has taken place upon the silent and everlasting shores of the great beyond.

Mr. DOUGHTON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Speaker, the life of every man exerts an influence either for good or evil upon those with whom he associates. This truth has often been impressed upon me during the long life vouchsafed me by the kindness of Providence. Notably so, and markedly distinct, was this evident in connection with the life of our late friend, SAMUEL MITCHELL BRINSON.

The first time I met Mr. BRINSON I realized that he was a man of rare and unusual attributes. He possessed two of the great qualities essential to high achievement in life—courage, both moral and physical, and a love for truth.

A lofty and generous patriotism, forgetfulness of self, absolute sincerity in word, in thought, and in deed, these, with an intense love for humanity, constituted the basis of his character. He ever stood for one principle—unchanging and imperishable—a supreme sense of duty.

Ability to endure suffering is a marked virtue of courage, and this quality was manifested to an eminent degree by our late colleague.

Suffering is necessary to make up a great character to its fullness. No man or woman, unless by the special providence of God, can live in the unbroken sunshine of plenty and prosperity without developing to a greater or less degree selfishness in some of its many hideous forms and being debarred from reaching the high state of excellence to which their nature might aspire. Suffering is needed to purify nations as well as individuals. It is from sacrificial flames that have arisen the noblest and grandest spirits which have shed a halo around humanity.

One trait of Mr. BRINSON's character which was predominant and contributed largely to his usefulness was his faith in the providence of God; no misfortune or disaster could shake his fortitude; it mattered not what had happened or how severe the trials to which he was subjected.

Courage and gentleness are closely allied. One rarely meets a man of high order of courage who is not also distinguished by his kindness and gentleness. His tender watchfulness and care for his daughter was beautiful, and attracted the attention of all who love and admire this moral trait of character.

Mr. BRINSON's political views were very decided. He made no compromise with those who would traffic in the honor of his State, or the best interests of its citizens, but he was ever their uncompromising foe.

He was passionately devoted to the good name of North Carolina, its fame and renown. He was worthy of any position to which his fellow citizens might have elevated him, but he was never envious of the political promotion of others. He was always satisfied if truth and justice prevailed, regardless of to whom the honors were given. It would have been difficult to have found a more unselfish and patriotic man living within the confines of his native State.

He was a very citadel of strength; all turned for help to him when the cause of morality was in danger. He never hesitated to espouse cordially what he believed to be the cause of right. If he erred, as all of us must do at times, it was on the side of humanity and morality. One always felt stronger and better for his companionship and advice.

The memory of Mr. BRINSON will live through many generations, and many a father and mother will bless his name for the example he has left to their children to point them the way to usefulness to their fellow citizens and honor to their State.

He died in the triumph and faith of the Christian religion and left a name without blemish and without reproach—a heritage of honor to his daughter, to his State, and to our common country.

Mr. STEDMAN resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to speak much of the political life of my lamented colleague. I shall speak more of his personal character and of service rendered outside his political career. In committee meetings, in this House, and wherever I met him, I was impressed that S. M. BRINSON was a man of information and ability, a man of clearness of thought and definiteness of action. Yet information and ability can not alone make a useful and effective life. A man may have large intellectuality, broad culture, and extensive influence, and yet his life may be worse than a failure. If a man's talents be not used to the real service of his fellow men and to the honor of the River of Life, then his life is not a success. England's poet laureate said:

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good;
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

The greatest tribute that can be paid to the memory of S. M. BRINSON is not that he was a man of intellectuality—though he was intellectual—nor that he was a man of influence, though the attainment of influence is abundantly worth while. But my tribute to SAMUEL BRINSON is higher still. He was a man of high Christian character, who dedicated his powers to the betterment of his fellow men and to the advancement of the Kingdom of God. To a former chaplain of this House the rugged old Carlisle of England said late in life:

Tell my friend in America that after a long and stormy life, I still believe "The chief end of man is to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever."

In other words, the rugged old Carlisle, though called a cynic and by some called a skeptic, still held to the simple faith which in his childhood he had learned from his catechism. So with SAMUEL BRINSON.

It was my privilege to be one of the congressional party who went to his home town to attend his funeral. There I saw the devotion of the people among whom he had lived and loved and labored, and who clearly realized that they had lost a genuine friend and a strong champion of their rights and their best interests.

Before entering the arena of politics he had given his life largely to work in the fields of education and religion.

As superintendent of education he had done a tireless and effective work. Not only the schools of his own city and county, but those of the surrounding counties are better and more efficient because of his energy, ingenuity, and devotion. And boys and girls yet unborn will have happier school days and better opportunities and will live bigger and broader lives because of the official service of SAMUEL M. BRINSON.

As an active and earnest Christian layman, he gave much of his time and energy to the work of his church and the religious activities of his community and to efforts to lead the young people especially into the discipleship of Jesus Christ. And I feel sure that in the brighter and better life to which he has gone he will yet receive the gratitude of those who by his influence were brought to the joys of Christian faith.

What higher achievement can any man attain than that of leading large numbers of his fellows into the light of education and into the still brighter light of Christian faith?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a number of my colleagues have expressed a desire to extend their remarks in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that those who may desire to do so may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD concerning the life, character, and services of Mr. BRINSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that those Members who desire to do so may extend their remarks in the RECORD on the life and character and services of Mr. BRINSON. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the service of SAMUEL MITCHELL BRINSON in the House of Representatives of the United States was all too brief. It continued from March 4, 1919, to April 13, 1922, a period of only a little over three years. During that short period I had the opportunity and privilege of knowing personally Mr. BRINSON well, for we served together on two committees of the House. It is on these committees in the close contact and almost intimate relations of our work there that the character and qualifications of our associates become best known. It soon became apparent from such acquaintance with Mr. BRINSON that his nature was a rare combination of clear mind, pure heart, and high ideals. Any appeal based on justice, fair dealing, and, what Theodore Roosevelt used to call "civic righteousness," met with a ready response from him and enlisted his earnest support.

The life of Mr. BRINSON may be divided into three periods: That portion covered by his practice of law; that by his public service in education; and that by his service as a legislator in the Congress of the United States. To my mind there could have been no more valuable preparation for his work as a legislator than his experience as a lawyer and as an educator.

I know that much prejudice exists against lawyers in public service. I know that there is a feeling at least somewhat prevalent that there are too many lawyers in Congress. But lawyers have been both numerous and prominent in Congress throughout our history. For more than a century the people of the United States have continued to act on the belief that those were qualified to make laws who knew the law, and I indulge the belief that the reasoned, matured judgment of the people is of more value than the criticisms of the envious. I think it well to recall that from the formation of the Constitution down to the present day almost every step of progress, almost every guaranty of freedom, almost every beneficent law adopted has been formulated, advocated, and supported to final passage by the lawyer-statesmen who have served in the Congress of the United States.

And so I am satisfied that our colleague was strengthened and aided in his service here by reason of his study and practice of the law.

For more than 15 years Mr. BRINSON served as superintendent of public instruction for Craven County in North Carolina. This service was so distinguished that in large measure it resulted in his being called to the larger field of service here in Congress. This educational work also prepared and aided him in his work here. Education not only forms character in the individual but it also forms the character of the State or Nation. A State is but an association of individuals for their protection and betterment. It can not rise higher than the character and intelligence of the individuals who compose it. For this reason free governments especially must depend for their security and progress on the character and intelligence of their people. It must be evident that one who devotes thought and energy to enlarging the knowledge and elevating the character of the people can not but be himself increased in knowledge and strengthened in character for a larger field of public service.

And so our associate came to us well equipped for a career of great usefulness in the service of his country. His loss we deeply deplore. It is not only a breaking of the ties of fellowship, but it comes to us as a sad reflection that we have lost a distinct and potent force for good from the public service. Such losses are as much more serious than material losses as human worth is greater than sordid wealth. Men make and must preserve the State. More and more is it realized that most political ills can be cured by the simple method of electing good men to office. Perhaps we depend too much on forms of government. Too often, it is certain, we are indifferent as to the qualifications and character of those who serve and represent it. A form of democracy will not suffice unless we make it in fact representative of the common good. It follows that in a democracy there is no one thing so valuable, so indispensable, as good men in its service. There is no nobler ambition than worthily to serve the State. But no service can be worthy or of value to the people unless it be devoid of self-seeking and selfish purpose.

SAMUEL MITCHELL BRINSON was a good man, unselfish, devoted, a man of character, ability, and of high and noble purpose. His untimely death is a source of deep regret to his associates and a great loss to the people and the Nation he so faithfully served. It is a privilege for me, who only knew him for a few brief years but who respected and admired him greatly, to add this tribute to his memory.

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Speaker, my service in the House of Representatives of the United States with Mr. BRINSON was very short, but it was long enough for me in my association with him to recognize in him the fine qualities of head and heart which he possessed, and to appreciate the faithful service he rendered as a Representative of his State, and further to know that his death was a loss to the country, which he loved so well and served so patriotically.

He came to the House of Representatives a little more than a year before I was sworn in, and we served together only about two years, and not all of that time was Congress in session. In that time, however, I saw a great deal of him, as our offices were not far apart, and we were together frequently.

Coming in personal and social contact with him I became very much impressed with the soundness and solidity of thought of the man. I gathered from his conversation that he had not only been trained as a lawyer, but that he had served his State in the educational field. I recall that he stated to me that he had been a superintendent of education in his Commonwealth. He was imbued with a desire to be of service to his fellowmen, and with that desire in mind he faithfully and conscientiously gave his service without stint. I do not know when I have ever met a man who impressed me as being more earnest and conscientious in his public labors than Mr. BRINSON.

He was unusually well equipped for service as a legislator. While not possessing the showy qualities of the ephemeral publicity seeker, who strives to gain publicity through some sensational speech or work, he took great pains with all that he did and posted himself thoroughly on every question that came before him. Others have spoken of his work on the committees on which he served and have told how zealously and faithfully he labored. I did not have the pleasure of serving with him on any committees, but did observe the faithfulness with which he watched carefully all matters of public interest that arose as the subject of legislation in Congress. He was a man of splendid judgment, and I came to rely very much on his opinions regarding matters that were in debate.

Mr. BRINSON realized how hampering inexperience with the parliamentary procedure was to a newly elected Member of the House, and with his kindness and unfailing courtesy it was always his pleasure to advise with me on matters upon which I consulted him. He pointed out to me the difficulties that a newly elected Representative would have, and he gave advice always cheerfully and most courteously. It is a great advantage to an inexperienced man in Congress to have the advice of such a man as Mr. BRINSON.

During a great part of the time he was evidently suffering a great deal, but I never heard him complain. He bore his illness with great fortitude and continued his labors when many a man of less determinnation would not have attempted to carry on his work.

There is a great place in the affairs of our country for such men, who do their work cheerfully and uncomplainingly and with fidelity and zeal in the public service. The rewards for public service come late to such men, but they always come in the course of time as their fidelity and honesty and earnestness impress more and more the men with whom they serve and the people for whom they work.

It is a sad duty to have to voice the regret at the death of a colleague and friend, but I felt, Mr. Speaker, that I desired to lay my humble tribute before you in behalf of this very devoted public servant.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator and Representative, the House will stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 12, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 12, 1923.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we give Thee thanks for the brightness of the morning. We give Thee thanks that in the passage of the years Thou dost give to us inspiration and direction in the paths of duty. We call to mind men of noble character, of great and devoted patriotism, and for all they have been to their country in the times of great stress and need. We think of one especially this morning whose natal anniversary claims the attention of multitudes of our people. The Lord grant unto us always such a sense of duty, such a high regard for the highest and best interests of the country that we may serve Thee acceptably. Through Christ, our Lord. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1923.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. GEORGE MOSES, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MOSES thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer and directed that the Journal be read.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, February 5, 1923, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, a report concerning the number and cost of maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles operated by the department in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD in 8-point type the reply of Secretary Hughes transmitted by the President on Saturday to a resolution on the use of automobiles by the executive departments. I want to commend the reply of Secretary Hughes in regard to automobiles. I wish his example might be followed by other departments.

There being no objection, the message and the communication of the Secretary of State were ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State furnishing, in response to the Senate's resolution of January 6, 1923, information concerning the passenger automobile in use by the Department of State.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 10, 1923.

The PRESIDENT:

The Department of State has received from the Secretary of the Senate an attested copy of a joint resolution adopted by the Senate on January 6, 1923, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the head of each department and the head of each independent bureau or commission of the Government in the city of Washington, including the District Commissioners, be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate as early as may be practicable the number of passenger automobiles in use by such department, independent bureau, or commission; the name of the official or person to whom such automobile is assigned; the cost thereof; the cost of the upkeep and operation thereof; the salary or pay of chauffeur furnished, if one is furnished, to the end that the Senate may have accurate information as to the number of automobiles, the cost thereof, the person using same, and all the facts pertaining thereto in each department, independent bureau, or commission in the city of Washington. If allowances for privately owned automobiles are made in any department, independent bureau, or commission to officers or employees of such department, independent bureau, or commission, then the amount of such allowances for upkeep or operation shall be reported, with the names and positions of those to whom such allowances are made. Also the number, location, and cost of any garage or garages maintained by such department, independent bureau, or commission; where such garages are located; number of employees used in said garages; cost of same; rentals on same; and all other information in connection therewith; the number of passenger automobiles kept in said garages and the number of trucks; the names of such officers or employees keeping such automobiles in said garages. The heads of the several departments, independent bureaus, or commissions are likewise directed to furnish, in reports separate from the foregoing facts, like facts, figures, and information concerning the use, upkeep, and operation of all passenger vehicles in use in their said departments, independent bureaus, or commissions outside the city of Washington."

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to furnish to the President the information requested by the resolution with respect to the Department of State, with a view to its transmission to the Senate if the President's judgment approve thereof:

The Department of State has one official passenger automobile which is assigned for the exclusive use of the Secretary of State. The car at present used by the Secretary of State is a LaFayette limousine which was purchased under authority granted by the act approved June 1, 1922, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes." The amount appropriated for the purchase was $4,500 and the cost of the car was $5,700. The difference of $1,200 between the amount appropriated and the purchase cost of the car was allowed by the selling company in exchange for the Packard limousine formerly assigned to the Secretary of State. Since July 1 last the cost of upkeep and operation of the car above mentioned, including gasoline, repairs, and storage charges, has averaged $91.10 per month. This car is stored in the War Department garage. The storage charges which are included in the charges above stated, and which include washing and care of the car, amount to $20 per month. A chauffeur is provided for in the State Department appropriation act at a salary of $1,080 per annum. In addition to this salary, the chauffeur receives the bonus of $240 per annum allowed by law.

This is the only passenger automobile in use by the Department of State in or outside the city of Washington.

No allowances are made by the Department of State for any privately owned automobiles, nor is any garage maintained by the department for housing or storage of such automobiles.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

REPORT OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the comptroller for the year ended October 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ROYAL DUTCH-SHELL OIL COMPANIES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a report of the Federal Trade Commission, made pursuant to Senate Resolution 311 (submitted by Mr. KING and agreed to on the calendar day of January 27, 1922), relative to the ownership by persons who are not citizens of the United States of shares of the Union Oil Co., a Delaware corporation, the Union Oil Co., a California corporation, and the Shell Oil Co., a California corporation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures and, on motion of Mr. KING, the letter of submittal was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 12, 1923.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: The Federal Trade Commission submits herewith a report on foreign ownership in the petroleum industry, pursuant to Senate Resolution 311, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session.

This report describes the organization, development, and present status of the Royal Dutch-Shell group, with special reference to its holdings in the United States, and particularly the absorption of the Union Oil Co. (Delaware); it relates the facts regarding the present ownership and control of the Union Oil Co., of California, and outlines the situation with respect to discrimination of foreign governments against citizens of this country in the acquisition and development of petroleum-producing properties in foreign lands.

The more important facts developed in this report may be concisely stated as follows:

1. The Royal Dutch-Shell group, a combination of the Royal Dutch Co. and the Shell Transport & Trading Co., of London, has world-wide oil investments, including numerous refineries, an immense fleet of tank ships, and petroleum production in many lands which, in 1921, was no less than 11 per cent of the world output.

2. The Royal Dutch-Shell group in February, 1922, consummated a merger of the principal properties and investments of the Union Oil Co. (Delaware), with its chief American subsidiaries, in a new company, the Shell Union Oil Corporation.

3. The Shell Union Oil Corporation now controls over 240,950 acres of oil lands in the United States; has about 3.5 per cent of the total output of crude petroleum; owns extensive properties in refineries, pipe lines, tank cars, and marketing equipment; and is one of the larger companies in the domestic petroleum industry.

4. The Union Oil Co. (Delaware) owned about 26 per cent of the stock of the Union Oil Co., of California, but, to prevent the Royal Dutch-Shell group from gaining control, certain stockholders of the Union of California organized an American-controlled holding company, which now owns more than half of its issued stock.

5. The most important instances of discrimination by foreign governments against citizens of this country are the exclusive policies of the Governments of Great Britain and the Netherlands in respect to the oil fields of India and the Dutch East Indies, and the 1922 San Remo agreement of Great Britain and France covering the undeveloped oil fields of Mesopotamia and of the British and French colonies.

6. Denial of reciprocity of treatment to citizens of this country appears to exist with respect to the petroleum industry of Australia, British Borneo, certain African colonies, British Honduras, British Guiana, and Trinidad; France and French possessions; Italy, and the Netherlands and its dependencies.

7. Thus forced to modify its historic policy, Congress in 1920 enacted a mineral leasing law for public lands, which forbids the acquisition of properties by the nationals of any foreign country that denies reciprocity to Americans, in consequence of which certain applications for petroleum leaseholds have been denied to the Royal Dutch-Shell group.

What further efforts may be made by this combination to acquire privately owned petroleum lands or competing oil companies, it is, of course, impossible to predict, or how far antitrust laws may be effective to prevent them.

The supply of crude petroleum in this country is being rapidly depleted to meet the requirements of a growing domestic consumption and foreign trade. The sources of supply of the domestic industry are concentrated within its own borders and in Mexico, while those of its principal competitor are widely distributed throughout the whole world. It appears obvious that a nation having widely distributed supply and storage facilities and owning the means of distribution will have certain advantages in world trade against one having concentrated supply.

Respectfully,

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
By HUSTON THOMPSON,
Acting Chairman.

Attest:

OTIS B. JOHNSON, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON. The General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, now in session, on the 6th instant adopted a resolution advocating an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the taxation of securities. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and in conformity to the practice of the Senate that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and under the rule it will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 14.

Whereas there is now pending before our National Congress a measure known as the Green resolution, for the purpose of bringing about an amendment to our Federal Constitution to make it possible to tax securities now exempted from taxation: And now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the House of representatives concurring therein), That after full consideration of the subject we hereby indorse the Green resolution now pending in Congress, and we respectfully request the Arkansas delegation in Congress to take the proper steps to make effective our wishes in regard to this matter; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the Senate is hereby directed to have copies of this resolution printed and forwarded at once to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, and to each of our delegation in Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I present and ask to have referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, praying for the enactment of a law authorizing the issuance of patents for the farm units on Federal reclamation projects, subject to final payment for the same, in order that taxes may be levied thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The memorial will be received and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and under the rule printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

Senate Joint Memorial No. 1, introduced by Rhoads.

Memorial to the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as may be necessary to issue patents to farm units on Federal reclamation projects in order that such farm units may become taxable.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas during the past few years many Federal reclamation projects have been established in the State of Montana and the farm units thereof sold to settlers; and

Whereas such settlers have established schools and road districts on such projects which depend for maintenance and support upon taxes levied for that purpose upon the property of such settlers, including the equity of such settlers in the said farm units; and

Whereas by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States (Irvin v. Webb, U. S. Sup. Ct. 66 L. ed. 333) the said farm units have been held to be nontaxable until patents therefor have been issued to the purchaser; and

Whereas under the existing laws of the United States such patents may not be issued until the final payment is made for such farm units; and

Whereas the money derived from taxation of the personal property alone on such projects is not sufficient to maintain the schools and roads established on said projects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this legislative assembly that the Congress of the United States should enact such legislation as may be necessary to authorize the issuance of patents for the farm units on Federal reclamation projects, subject to the final payment for the same, in order that taxes may be levied thereon; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Montana in Congress.

NELSON STORY, Jr.,
President of the Senate.
CALVIN CRUMBAKER,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table a brief resolution adopted by the directors of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, at Lexington, Ky., with reference to the funding of the foreign debt.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BURLEY TOBACCO GROWERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Lexington, Ky.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at the regular meeting of the directors of the Burley Tobacco Growers' Cooperative Association, held at Lexington, Ky., Wednesday, February, 7, 1923, and the secretary was directed to mail a copy of same to each of the honorable United States Senators and Representatives from the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Tennessee, and West Virginia, being the States in which virtually all of the burley tobacco grown in this country is produced, and to bespeak their earnest and favorable consideration of same, to wit:

"Whereas it is known to all that there can be no real stabilization of the commercial or economic condition of the world, that its peace will remain in jeopardy until there is some settlement of existing debts between the nations involved in the late World War, and that the best interests of all the people of the earth will be served by the earliest settlement that can be arrived at; and

"Whereas there is no people of this country and no industry of this Nation that is more vitally concerned in the settlement of said question than the farmers and those engaged in the farming industry of this country; and

"Whereas such a settlement will open up to the farmers and allied business interests additional markets for the consumption of the growing surplus of this country, thereby affording greater opportunity for profit and employment of our people, which is daily becoming more of a necessity to our peace and progress; and

"Whereas Great Britain is now our largest customer and the greatest consumer of our surplus products, and whatever adds to its purchasing power adds to our prosperity, and by the stabilization of its affairs all of Europe will be helped and started on the road to peace, prosperity, and a better understanding: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the unanimous opinion of this board, representing a membership of 78,864 members, numbering among its membership some of the largest landowners, taxpayers, and growers of farm products in the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Tennessee, and West Virginia, that the best interests of the United States and the world at large will be served and farming and other business of our country sooner revived and substantially improved by the early approval by Congress of the terms recommended by the American commission on the refunding of the British debt to the United States growing out of the late World War. We feel that the immediate settlement upon the terms agreed upon and at the rate of interest fixed by said commission will afford our people to soon make more thorough cordial business relations than can possibly be obtained by quibbling over a small increase in the interest rate or a shortening of maturity."

We want what our boys fought for—an early and liberal settlement of world conditions.

Mr. McNARY presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF OREGON,
THIRTY-SECOND LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY, REGULAR SESSION,
Hall of Representatives.

House Joint Memorial No. 3.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of Oregon State Legislature have under consideration at the present time various income-tax measures which have been introduced ostensibly for the purpose of redistribution of the tax burden of the State of Oregon; and

"Whereas the people of the State of Oregon indicated by their affirmative vote at the last general election their desire for an income tax measure; and

"Whereas there is a strong probability that an income-tax measure will be passed by the present legislative assembly; and

"Whereas in the event such income-tax measure is passed it will be necessary for the officers of the State of Oregon to have access to the income-tax returns filed under the Federal income tax law now in effect; and

"Whereas the officers of the State of Oregon do not now have access to the income-tax returns filed by individuals: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the Senate jointly concurring), That we most earnestly petition and memorialize the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Washington in the name of the State of Oregon that Congress enact such legislation as will permit and require the various collectors of internal revenue to permit upon application of such commission or person as authorized by the Governor of the State of Oregon to examine any and all income-tax returns filed under the Federal income tax act by individuals, corporations, and others doing business in the State of Oregon, as well as any persons, corporations, or others deriving any income from business transacted in the State of Oregon: Provided, however, That the same secrecy which safeguards income-tax records made to the Federal Government be extended to any information regarding income-tax statements furnished to the officials of the State of Oregon; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each Member of Congress of the United States of America and to the respective legislatures of the respective States of the United States."

(Indorsed: House joint memorial No. 3, introduced by Mr. McMahan, of Linn County; W. F. Drager, chief clerk. Filed February 2, 1923, Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state.)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state of the State of Oregon and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify:

That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 3 with the original thereof adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-second Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon and filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon February 2, 1923, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon. Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 2d day of February, A. D. 1923.

[SEAL.]
SAM A. KOZER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. LADD. I ask unanimous consent to present and have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and printed in the RECORD in 8-point type a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota recommending and urging stabilization of wheat prices.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein)—

Whereas since the cessation of the war with Germany and the removal of the minimum wheat price guaranty of the Federal Government in effect during a part of the period of said war, the price of wheat to the wheat producer of the Northwest has depreciated to a point far below the cost of production; and

Whereas the general level of price on articles which the wheat producer is obliged to buy and consume gives no promise of a proportionate reduction, but, on the contrary, appears to be increasing at this time; and

Whereas these circumstances have caused an unprecedented condition of distress to the wheat producer of the Northwest, and to all legitimate enterprises more or less directly dependent upon his prosperity and solvency, which condition of distress is so acute as to threaten a great loss of population in the farming communities of the Northwest, accompanied by consequent insolvency, bankruptcy, and other results so dire and serious as to directly and indirectly affect a large proportion of the population of the Nation; and

Whereas the Federal guaranty of a minimum price on wheat during a part of the war period was, in fact, a serious injustice to the wheat producer of the Northwest, resulting as it did in greatly reducing his price far below the level of the price which supply and demand conditions would have otherwise created, and which therefore operated as an actual and artificial reduction and limitation of his price and not as a subsidy; and

Whereas the Government of the United States received $50,000,000 as profits from the operation of the United States Grain Corporation during the war, which really belongs to the producer; and

Whereas the Northwest wheat producer alone among all the producers in the United States suffered such arbitrary reduction in the price of his product during the war period from which the entire consuming public directly benefited, he being obliged during the said period to pay the highest market prices for all articles which he used and consumed, there being no governmental limitation on the price of any such article during said period; and

Whereas this present condition resulting from the foregoing is such as to threaten a calamity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That we do hereby respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to take cognizance of the present situation in which the Northwest wheat farmer is placed, and the circumstances which have resulted in his present condition of distress and guarantee a minimum price of $1.50 per bushel while this emergency lasts; be it further

Resolved, That inasmuch as the policy of Government aid has been recognized under similar circumstances as being proper and constitutional and was so recognized in the six months' guaranty provision to the railroads, and is now being urged in connection with the so-called ship subsidy bill, the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged and earnestly petitioned to labor to the end that it may find a proper and constitutional means of bringing immediate relief to the Northwest wheat producer by guaranteed price; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to all Members of both Houses of the National Congress from North Dakota immediately upon its passage and approval.

RAY JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House.
W. F. CUSHING,
Chief Clerk of the House.
FRANK H. HYLAND,
President of the Senate.
[SEAL.] W. E. PARSONS,
Secretary of the Senate.

This certifies that the foregoing resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, the senate concurring therein.

W. F. CUSHING,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution of the Benson County National Farm Loan Association, of North Dakota, protesting against the passage of House bill 13125, proposing to amend certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented petitions of 24 citizens of Tioga and White Earth, N. Dak., praying for the passage of legislation abolishing the discriminatory tax in existing law on small-arms ammunition and firearms, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Benson County National Farm Loan Association, of North Dakota, protesting against the passage of House Joint Resolution 314, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States making all Federal securities subject to State income tax, and all State, county, and municipal securities subject to Federal income tax, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted at an executive council meeting of the International Typographical Union with the executive boards of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, the International Photo-Engravers' Union, the International Stereotypers and Electrotypers' Union, and the International Brotherhood of Bookbinders, at Indianapolis, Ind., protesting against the passage of the so-called ship subsidy bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the directors of the Norwich (Conn.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the passage of Senate bill 4202, providing for the creation of a national police bureau in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the United Congregational Church School, of Norwich, Conn., favoring an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which were referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 91) authorizing the President to require the United States Equalization Board (Inc.) to adjust a transaction relating to 3,500 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, and the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 2,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic and adjust the loss sustained thereby, reported them favorably without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1135) thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6423) to detach Pecos County, in the State of Texas, from the Del Rio division of the western judicial district of Texas and attach same to the El Paso division of the western judicial district of said State, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1136) thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1137) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 4350) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to erect a monument at Fort Pierre, S. Dak., to commemorate the explorations and discoveries of the Verendrye brothers, and to expend not to exceed $25,000 therefor;

A bill (S. 4463) to authorize the erection of a memorial monument or fountain as a gift to the people of the United States by the Henry B. F. Macfarland memorial committee; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 277) granting permission for the erection of a monument to symbolize the national game of baseball.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 274) to provide for the participation of the United States in the observance of the one hundredth anniversary of the enunciation of the Monroe doctrine and of the ninety-second anniversary of the death of James Monroe, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3761) for the relief of James Moran, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1138) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4308) to authorize the general accounting officers of the United States to allow credit to certain disbursing officers for payments of salary made on properly certified and approved vouchers, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1140) thereon.

SOUTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO.

Mr. PAGE. The bill (H. R. 7010) for the relief of the Southern Transportation Co. was considered by the Committee on Claims of the House and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate. I can not understand why it was sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have taken up the matter with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the chairman of the Committee on Claims, and he thinks the bill should properly go to that committee. I move that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN EMBASSY IN SANTIAGO, CHILE.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4522) authorizing the Secretary of State to convey certain land owned by the United States in Santiago, Chile, to the municipality of that city, and to acquire or receive in exchange therefor other land located in the said city.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts explain the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it is very easily explained. We bought and own a very fine embassy in the city of Santiago, Chile, with the land surrounding the embassy. On a portion of the land, a small lot 15 by 40 feet, with frontage on another street, there is a small adobe shanty. The city is going to put a new street through there and desires to take that small lot in order to get rid of the building, and will give us another piece of land at the other end of the embassy grounds which is even better than the lot to be taken by them. It is a good exchange for us. The bill is simply to authorize the Secretary of State to make the exchange of this small parcel of land.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there is no objection to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. There can be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State, acting as the agent of the Government of the United States, is hereby authorized to convey to the municipality of Santiago, Chile, the title to and interest in a portion, containing not more than 30 square meters, of that parcel of land located in the city of Santiago on which the American Embassy is situated, together with the building thereon, known as 206 Merced Street, and other appurtenances thereto, and to acquire with the proceeds thereof, which are hereby appropriated for that purpose, or receive in exchange therefor, title to a parcel of land not exceeding 30 square meters in extent at the western end of Bueras Street and the appurtenances pertaining thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WELLER:

A bill (S. 4526) authorizing the construction, maintenance, and operation of a dam and appurtenant intake and outlet structures across or in the Potomac River at or near Williamsport, Washington County, Md.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4527) for the relief of A. H. Rebentish; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4529) to complete the publication of the Moses Austin and Stephen F. Austin papers; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BROOKHART:

A bill (S. 4530) granting a pension to Ed Colins; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 4531) granting a pension to Nestor Alarcon;

A bill (S. 4532) granting a pension to Bernard Higgins;

A bill (S. 4533) granting a pension to Fannie E. Hilton;

A bill (S. 4534) granting an increase of pension to Edith B. Macon; and

A bill (S. 4535) granting a pension to Felipe Perata y Cisneros; to the Committee on Pensions.

KANSAS CITY, MEXICO & ORIENT RAILROAD.

Mr. SHEPPARD introduced a bill (S. 4528) for the relief of the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railroad of Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present, for reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, a memorial of the Texas Legislature supporting the bill which I have introduced for the relief of the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railroad.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution relating to Orient Railroad, by Texas Legislature, on January 17, 1922.

The speaker laid before the house for consideration at this time the following resolution:

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 8, relating to the Orient Railroad.

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the House of Representatives concurring), That the following memorial and petition to the Congress of the United States and prayer for relief from pending disaster and destruction of the Orient Railroad be adopted by the Thirty-eighth Legislature of the State of Texas and presented to the Congress of the United States and to the Interstate Commerce Commission; that

Whereas the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railroad, particularly that part of it built through Texas, is built through a pioneer section of the State susceptible of great development possibilities if given transportation facilities that must come through the proper maintenance and operation of said road, which aid and assistance can only come through the united action of our Federal Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission permitting said road and the physical properties thereof to be taken over and operated under such conditions as will permit said road to continue as a factor for good in the development of that section of the State through which it has been constructed; and

Whereas the necessity for such transportation facilities in the proper development of the pioneer section of our country has heretofore been recognized and encouraged both by Federal and State land grants; and

Whereas said land grants can no longer be extended to any road because of the exhaustion of the public lands by such railroad grants; and

Whereas a great injustice can be done to a patriotic citizenship by permitting the abandonment of said railroad and the discontinuance of its operations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the plan heretofore submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States by the Hon. Lynch Davidson, lieutenant governor of the State of Texas, and embodied in this resolution, as follows—

Immunity from and relaxation of both Federal and State transportation laws are solvents to save the Orient Railroad from abandonment, the scrap pile, and wreckage.

That purpose is to be accomplished by Federal and State legislation, an act to be enacted by the Federal Government exempting any railroad owned or of which a substantial part is owned by a sovereign State or by the Nation from all transportation acts and laws other than the ordinary civil laws of the State and Nation.

The classification of the Federal acts to provide that the title of a road or roads enjoying such immunity shall be vested in a sovereign State or an agency created by a sovereign State, which agency shall be equivalent to State ownership of some substantial part of the road or all of said road.

To further provide that any debt or obligation owing to the Federal Government by any road or roads so situated, whose rehabilitation and operation have been assumed by a State, shall be subordinated to all claims and moneys expended by said State in the rehabilitation or operation of such railroad.

The measure to further provide that any net profits not essential to improvements, development, and betterments shall apply 50 per cent to the State and 50 per cent to repayment of any sum advanced by the Federal Government.

To further provide that such immunity, in the event of sale, transfer, or lease of a road to individuals or corporations, etc., shall continue for a period of 10 or 15 years following such transfer, lease, or conveyance, provided the State shall retain its control of said road and reserve the right to direct its affairs.

The Federal act to require the State or States to furnish the necessary capital for rehabilitation and operation of the road to which it has taken title, and such requirements to constitute a substantial guaranty of continuity of operation of such road or roads by the State or those holding under it.

Repayment of all moneys due the State and Nation or by a railroad under this classification shall be condition of its relinquishment by the State.

The Federal act to be effective upon only the enactment of corresponding legislation by a State or States—

Be submitted to the Congress of the United States, with the request that suitable legislation be enacted carrying said plan into effect and directing the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States to make all suitable and necessary rules and regulations for the maintenance, operation, conduct, control, and management of said road in accordance with the terms of said plan.

Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be presented to the Oklahoma Legislature, now in session, and to the Kansas Legislature, now in session.

The resolution was read second time.

On motion of Mr. Chitwood, the resolution was referred to the committee on State affairs.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment providing that the Comptroller General of the United States be authorized and directed to adjust and audit the claim of the city of New York for expenses incurred by said city in aiding to suppress the insurrection against the United States during the years 1861 to 1865, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURSUM submitted an amendment proposing to pay $1,200 to Alexander K. Meek for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the third and fourth sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress as an assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, intended to be proposed by him to the third deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL CLERK TO DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BALL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 437), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That S. Res. 339, agreed to September 13, 1922, authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to continue the employment of an additional clerk, payable out of the contingent fund, until the end of the present Congress, be, and the same hereby is, further continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

MONTHLY REPORTS OF CONDITION OF RAILROAD EQUIPMENT.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask leave to submit a resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 438) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to report to the Congress, and when Congress is not in session to the President, as soon as possible after the first day of each month the condition of railroad equipment as revealed by the reports of the carriers and by the inspections of the commission, the number of persons killed, the number injured upon the railroads, and any other available data bearing upon the physical condition of the railroads and of railroad equipment, together with a statement of what action, if any, has been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission within its statutory power to remedy the situation.

Resolved further, That such monthly reports as soon as transmitted to the President or to the Congress shall be available to the public.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the resolution lie upon the table, to be called up by me at the first opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will lie upon the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had adopted the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 38) requesting the President to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 440) to satisfy the award rendered against the United States by the arbitral tribunal established under the special agreement concluded June 30, 1921, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Norway, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10 and 25 to the said bill and concurred therein; and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26 and concurred therein with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 24, 55, 64, 65, 75, 117, and 123 to the said bill and concurred therein; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 33, 56, 76, 83, 105, 112, 116, 118, 124, 126, and 129 and had concurred therein, severally, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer [Mr. MOSES] as Acting President pro tempore:

H. R. 855. An act for the relief of Fred G. Leith, United States Navy;

H. R. 6204. An act to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla., and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes;

H. R. 11389. An act for the relief of Robert Guy Robinson;

H. R. 12007. An act providing for the conveyance of certain land to the city of Boise, Idaho, and from the city of Boise, Idaho, to the United States;

H. R. 12887. An act granting a pension to Jacob F. Rosenberger; and

H. R. 13696. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 440. A joint resolution to satisfy the award rendered against the United States by the arbitral tribunal established under the special agreement concluded June 30, 1921, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Norway was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that this morning we begin the call of the calendar at the number where we left off on the last calendar day, Calendar No. 992, and that unobjected bills be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar may begin with No. 992, and that unobjected bills be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. STERLING. Is that done with the understanding that we shall begin then at the beginning of the calendar?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly; if the call of the calendar is completed before 2 o'clock, then we will begin at the beginning of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. McNARY. I wish to inquire if that is the number at which we stopped when the calendar was last called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the number, as the Chair stated.

Mr. McNARY. Then if we finish the rest of the calendar, we will start with the first number on the calendar?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; we shall then start at the beginning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Kansas that the calling of the calendar begin with No. 992 and that unobjected bills be considered? The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will report Calendar No. 992.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand the order, it is that we will consider only unobjected bills?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the request.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the request of the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Kansas was that the call of the calendar should begin with the number where the call of the calendar was left off on the last day it was considered, and that unobjected bills shall be considered. The Secretary will report Calendar No. 992.

Calendar No. 992, the bill (S. 129) to provide for election contests in the Senate of the United States, was announced as first in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That bill was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have not yet had an opportunity to look into it fully, and I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, this is calendar Monday, and I emphatically object to call the calendar in any other fashion than in accordance with the rule. That is to say, I desire the rule to be strictly observed in this respect: That if anyone objects to a bill, a Senator shall have the right to move to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. LODGE. The order has already been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that unanimous consent has already been granted.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, of course, I am helpless and powerless, but I shall hereafter insist that those who ask for unanimous consent shall at least not whisper the request. I do not know who made it, and I think that is not exactly the best way to proceed with the calendar. I promised over a dozen Senators that we should have calendar Monday, but a whispered conversation arises as a result of which we are precluded from moving to proceed to the consideration of bills that are objected to. I ask unanimous consent that the order be rescinded and that the calendar be called as the rule requires it to be called.

Mr. CURTIS. In view of the fact that I presented the unanimous-consent request and stood in the center aisle, as I did so, and stated it loudly enough for the Chair to hear, and it was submitted to the Senate about three times by the Chair, I shall object to the Senator's request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether there will be an opportunity to consider those bills which precede Calendar No. 992. There are a number of us interested in those bills, and we would like to have them considered if possible.

Mr. CURTIS. It was stated when the unanimous-consent request was agreed to that if the calendar was completed before 1 o'clock, we would begin at the beginning and the call would proceed in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will announce for information that, in pursuance of that understanding, the Chair will hold that bills objected to, prior to No. 992 on the calendar, may be taken up on motion.

Mr. CURTIS. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the calendar will be reported.

The bill (H. R. 7761) to amend the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to proceedings in contested-election cases was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

The bill (S. 4283) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to require operators of motor vehicles in the District of Columbia to secure a permit, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3773) to reduce night work in the Postal Service was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4248) to fix the compensation of employees in post offices for overtime services performed in excess of eight hours daily was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3942) for the relief of John H. McAtee was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 4315) to amend section 2 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved July 31, 1894, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ESTATES OF CITIZENS DYING ABROAD.

The bill (S. 4379) to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, was announced as next in order.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who I observe reported this bill, to make a statement respecting its purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I will make a brief explanation of the bill. It relates to the disposition by the diplomatic and consular officers of the Government of the funds arising from the estates or effects of citizens of the United States who die abroad. At present such funds are handled by the Secretary of State, and the purpose of this bill is to turn them over to the accounting officers of the Government. No change is proposed in the existing law except the transfer of such funds to the accounting officers of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the report of the committee unanimous in favor of the bill?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the report is unanimously in favor of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to have the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of March 3, 1911, is hereby further amended so that the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the said section shall read as follows:

"Fifth. To transmit the balance of the estate to the General Accounting Office, to be holden in trust for the legal claimant; except that if at any time before such transmission the legal representative of the deceased shall appear and demand his effects in their hands they shall deliver them up, being paid their fees, and shall cease their proceedings.

"Sixth. The General Accounting Office shall act as conservator of such part of these estates as may be received, and for their protection the Comptroller General of the United States may order such effects to be sold as may consist of jewelry or other articles which have heretofore or may hereafter be received, and pay the expenses of such sale out of the proceeds: Provided, Application for these effects shall not have been made by the legal claimant within two years after their receipt. The Comptroller General is authorized to indorse all bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other evidences of indebtedness due to such estates, and to take such steps as may be necessary for their collection. The proceeds of such sales, together with such other moneys as may be collected by him, shall be deposited into the Treasury in trust for the legal claimant, and be reported to the Secretary of State."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAILING PRIVILEGES FOR PUBLICATIONS FOR THE BLIND.

The bill (S. 3078) to provide for the free transmission through the mails of certain publications for the blind was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am requested by the author of that bill to ask that the bill go over pending some conferences which it is desired may be held with the Post Office Department relative to the measure. It is an important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the Calendar.

EUGENE K. STOUDEMIRE.

The bill (S. 1031) for the relief of Eugene K. Stoudemire was considered in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized to extend to Eugene K. Stoudemire, who suffered the loss of an eye on August 3, 1915, while in the discharge of his duty as an engineer on the towboat Alabama, in the river and harbor service of the Government, the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like some explanation in regard to the bill and, furthermore, in regard to the policy which seems to be suggested under this bill and under one or two other bills which have recently come before us of extending the benefits of the compensation law to those who may have claims against the Government for injuries arising long before the passage of the act. It seems to me that when Congress passed a law and fixed the date when it should go into operation and made no provision that it should be retroactive, it is rather a dangerous precedent to have Congress now open up all cases involving persons who were injured at a period anterior to the passage of the law. If we permit injuries which were inflicted in 1915 to be compensated for, why not allow compensation to be paid by the Government for injuries which were inflicted in 1914 and in 1912 and in 1911 and in 1910, and, indeed, 20, 30, or 40 years ago? I should like some explanation as to the reason why the Government did not make the compensation act retroactive; and if it did not see fit in its wisdom to do so, why we should take up these cases by piecemeal and grant relief to all persons who were injured many years ago while in the employ of the Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, when this bill was introduced it sought to have paid to this injured man $7,500. The Committee on Claims investigated the case, however, and decided that the claimant was not entitled to that amount or that it would not consent that he be paid that amount in a lump sum, but that he did have a meritorious case and should be put on the list of those injured in the service of the Government who have been granted relief under the compensation act. That is what has been recommended by the committee. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the bill, Mr. President. He is a humble citizen——

Mr. ROBINSON. He is a laboring man?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; he is a laboring man. He suffered the loss of his eye, and as a result is in bad shape. He is a poor man; he was serving the Government at the time this accident occurred; he is, as I have said, a poor man and needs the money. I had hoped that the committee would recommend the payment of $7,500 to him; but, instead, it saw fit to put him on the list of those who were injured in the service of the Government, which will allow the payment to him of a small sum each month.

I trust that my friend from Utah will make no objection to the bill. I should like to have it passed by the Senate so that it may be sent to the House and receive consideration in that body before the present session of Congress expires.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether he believes the Government of the United States should now provide compensation for all persons who were injured prior to the passage of the compensation act, regardless of any statute of limitations, assuming there is a statute of limitations in these matters, back for 20 or 30 or 40 years? Where are we going to draw the line?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would be governed largely by the circumstances in the case. Many poor fellows who are injured do not know what to do until somebody tells them, "If you were injured while in the service of the Government you ought to have presented your claim to the Government." That frequently happens, and in many instances in cases of this sort a long time elapses after the injury occurs before any action is taken, because the person injured does not know what steps to take. The poor fellow who is the claimant in this case was knocked down and his eye put out; the committee investigated and saw fit to recommend that he be put on the list of those receiving benefits under the compensation act. I would favor relief for cases of that kind.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill; but it seems to me that when Congress had this subject before it in the beginning, knowing, undoubtedly, that there were persons who had been in the employ of the Government who had been injured, and did not see fit in their wisdom to make the bill retroactive so as to afford relief to those who may have been injured 5, 10, 15, or 20 years prior to that time, it is rather a dangerous thing for the Congress now to open the gates to all such claims.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill is somewhat unusual in form, but my information is that in a number of instances the Congress has provided for claimants whose injuries occurred prior to the passage of the compensation act by appropriating the sums which they would have received if they had been entitled to the benefits of that act.

Mr KING. That is to say, if the bill was in force at the time of the injury.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. This bill has the same effect as a number of bills reported from the Claims Committee and passed by the Senate heretofore giving the claimants the benefits of the provisions of the compensation act. The language is different, but the effect is the same. Quite a number of bills of this character have been enacted.

Mr. KING. May I say to my good friend from Arkansas that it is my understanding of the effect of the bill that it would, if passed, give the beneficiary the same rights and the same benefits as if the compensation had been in force at the time of the accident?

Mr. ROBINSON. In a number of cases, instead of making the provisions of the compensation act applicable to the particular individual and the injury that he sustained, the Congress has simply made an appropriation of the amount which would accrue to him under the compensation act.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to have my friend from Arkansas give his view as to the wisdom and propriety of going back of the compensation act and allowing compensation to persons who were injured long before the act was passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Congress had pursued the course implied in the question of the Senator from Utah and had declined to allow compensation to any individual before the compensation act became effective or applicable to his rights, I would be in sympathy with the proposal to deny its benefits in a particular case, such as the one at bar, but inasmuch as we have heretofore relaxed it in a number of instances, I see no reason why it should not be done in this case.

Mr. KING. The Senator will see that many years after an accident occurs it may be impossible to ascertain the facts and perhaps show very good reason why no compensation should be paid at all on any moral or legal ground.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Utah will also see that in a great many instances—I do not know that the statement is applicable to this particular case—where claims presented to the Congress of the United States the condition of business before the Congress is such that they can not have consideration here until after a great many years have elapsed. That statement is applicable to a large number of claims which are now pending before the Congress. It is admittedly difficult to give prompt consideration to every claim that is presented. Our system in that respect is subject to criticism. All such claims ought to be determinable by some tribunal having the qualifications and jurisdiction ordinarily possessed by courts, but I know that the Congress during my service here has passed a great many bills which have given to claimants who were injured prior to the passage of the compensation act the benefits of that act.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator I have been advised that certain persons have been quite alert since a number of these bills have been passed to find persons who were injured years before the compensation act was enacted for the purpose of urging the presentation of their claims to Congress. It seems to me that when Congress passed the compensation act it ought either to have provided for those who were injured prior to its enactment or fixed a time beyond which the benefits of the act would not go.

Mr. ROBINSON. As a general proposition, I think the Senator is right in that particular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPRESSION OF PROSTITUTION.

The bill (S. 3544) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Justice in relation to the repression of prostitution for the protection of the armed forces, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 2, line 19, after the words "June 30," to strike out "1923" and insert "1924," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the powers and duties of the Department of Justice be, and they are hereby, enlarged to enable the agents or representatives of the department to inquire into and investigate vice conditions in the vicinity of or adjacent to Army or naval camps, posts, stations, forts, ports, or hospitals in the continental United States, the Territories of the United States, the insular possessions of the United States, and the Panama Canal Zone, or at any place under the authority of the United States where the armed forces of the United States or ex-soldiers and ex-sailors of the United States are stationed under the care and authority of the United States, and to use every lawful means, either independently or in cooperation with the authorities of any State, city, town, county, District, Territory, or the authorities of the insular possessions of the United States and the Panama Canal Zone for the prevention and repression of such vice conditions for the protection of the armed forces or such ex-soldiers and ex-sailors against venereal infection.

SEC. 2. That the Department of Justice shall take over such of the duties, books, records, equipment, and personnel of the United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board as the President of the United States may by Executive order direct.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby authorized an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States annually, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, the sum of $325,000 to carry out the purposes of this act, including the payment for personnel services, books, furniture, periodicals, and necessary books of reference in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], who reported this bill, explain to us just exactly what means the representatives of the Department of Justice may take independently of the local authorities to accomplish the result to be achieved by this bill.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, I shall be glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. It found its way to the Committee on the Judiciary and was by that committee considered and reported with an amendment, the reason for the action of the committee being set forth in the printed report accompanying the bill.

The Senate is doubtless aware that the activities referred to in this bill have heretofore been discharged by an interdepartmental commission or committee. The purpose of the bill is to transfer those activities to the Department of Justice. The report accompanying the bill carries a letter addressed to me by the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Perhaps the Senator did not understand my question. I have no difficulty at all in arriving at the purpose of the bill. I addressed a specific question to the Senator, namely: The bill provides that the representatives of the Department of Justice shall take such means as may be necessary, any lawful means, for the prevention and repression of these vice conditions; and these lawful means are to be pursued either independently of the local authorities or in conjunction with the local authorities. What I want to know is, What are these independent means that the secret service will take, independently of the local authorities, to suppress vice conditions?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My immediate reply to the question would be this, although the Senator states the matter in such form, it seems to me, as to bring about its own answer: As I understand this proposed measure, the Department of Justice is to cooperate with the local authorities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite so, sir; but in addition to that they are to proceed independently, if they desire to do so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The word indicates what they are to do. If they have the legal power under existing laws, in cooperation, it may be, with the Army officers, they are to take such steps, suggest such means, and employ such persuasive force as will accomplish the end desired, namely, the protection as against dangerous diseases of the sailors and the soldiers in the public service. Just what means they would adopt, just in what way they would proceed, would be a matter within their discretion, as I understand this measure. I think that is a sufficient answer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is just exactly what I am trying to find out from the Senator. They may proceed in cooperation with the local authorities. That is to say, they may go before the justice of the peace or the committing magistrate and complain about violations of the local law, and the local authorities will thereupon proceed to prosecute. Anybody can understand that; but, in addition to that, they are given authority to proceed, independently of these local authorities, to do something. That is what I want to know. Here is a grant of authority to officers of the Secret Service to proceed independently, within the exclusive jurisdiction not of the United States but of the State authorities, by some means independent of the State authorities, to do something. What I want to know is, What it is that thing they are going to do?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me, then, to give my view touching the scope of this bill? I understand that the Department of Justice is to carry on the work hitherto carried on by the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board. In a word, as I recall and understand, that board has proceeded somewhat in this way——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from California has expired.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was answering the question of the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To be sure; but the Senator from California will recall that the Chair specifically asked if he yielded to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not know I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. The Chair said the Senator from California was recognized. The Chair wishes to state that in view of the crowded condition of the calendar, in view of the fact that there will be but three calendar days prior to the expiration of this Congress, and in view of the further fact that so many Senators are interested in measures upon the calendar, so far as the present occupant of the chair can do it the five-minute rule and the speaking-but-once rule will be strictly enforced.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not seeking to offend against that rule.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out the words "either independently or," in line 5, on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill as amended——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, there is objection to the passage of this bill as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the bill will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

FRANKLIN GUM.

The bill (S. 2598) for the relief of Franklin Gum was announced as next in order, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Franklin Gum, who was a private in Company A, Forty-eighth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged therefrom: Provided, That other than as above set forth no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to have an explanation of the bill and I should like to have the report read, too.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator desire the report to be read?

Mr. KING. Yes; I should like the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the report (No. 1033) submitted by Mr. BROOKHART on January 23, 1923, as follows:

Report to accompany S. 2598.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2598) for the relief of Franklin Gum, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The report from the War Department on this measure is appended hereto and made a part of this report, as follows:

CASE OF FRANKLIN GUM, PRIVATE, COMPANY A, FORTY-EIGHTH WISCONSIN INFANTRY, CIVIL WAR.

The records show that Franklin Gum was enrolled February 15, 1865, at Omro, Wis., and was mustered into service February 18, 1865, at Milwaukee, Wis., as a private of Company A, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry, to serve one year, and deserted therefrom April 1, 1865, at Camp Washburn, Milwaukee, Wis. He never thereafter returned to his command, which remained in service until December 30, 1865, or reported his whereabouts or the cause of his absence to the military authorities. No medical record in the case of this solider has been found.

It appears that prior to this soldier's service in the Army as above stated he served an enlistment in the United States Navy, and in applying to this department in 1895 for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge he stated that he was prevented from completing his term of enlistment in the Army because of chronic diarrhea contracted while serving in the Navy.

The soldier again made application to this department for relief in 1904, and submitted an affidavit in which he stated that he served as a private in Company A, Forty-eighth Wisconsin Infantry, until April 1, 1865, when without any intention of deserting he left the regiment under the following circumstances: "While we were stationed at Milwaukee I got a furlough to go home, and while at home was taken sick, it being a recurrence of chronic diarrhea that I contracted during my previous service in the Navy; and when my furlough expired I was not able to return to my regiment, and for that reason I could not report for duty."

This soldier again testified, April 20, 1907, that he served faithfully until on or about the —— day of April, 1865; that he left the regiment on furlough and was unable to return on account of sickness—chronic diarrhea.

The application for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge in the case of this soldier has been denied and now stands denied on the ground that he did not complete his term of enlistment and that it has not been satisfactorily established that he was prevented from completing it by reason of disability incurred in the line of duty in the Army, and because the case does not come within any of the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889 (25 Stat. L. 869), which is the only law in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT C. DAVIS,
Acting The Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
The Adjutant General's Office, June 7, 1922.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Three affidavits have been submitted to your committee regarding this case. All three affidavits recite the facts in detail, and, as they agree in all the details, is is thought that only one need be inserted in this report. An affidavit from A. A. Wiles is therefore inserted, as follows:

"IN RE FRANKLIN GUM, OMRO, WIS., LANDSMAN, U. S. S. 'GREAT WESTERN,' AND PRIVATE, COMPANY A, FORTY-EIGHTH WISCONSIN INFANTRY, CIVIL WAR.

"STATE OF WISCONSIN, Winnebago County, ss:

"A. A. Wiles, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is now and ever since the year 1864 has continuously been a resident of the village of Omro, Winnebago County, Wis.; that ever since the year 1864 he has known the above-named Franklin Gum; that he knew of him as a soldier in the Civil War and of his service in the United States Navy; that since he came home from the War of the Rebellion he has known him to be in poor health, particularly immediately after his return from the Army; that during all of his years of acquaintance with the said Franklin Gum he has known him to be a good, law-abiding citizen, a person without financial means, and because of his advanced age at the present time and his condition of poverty and poor health he is unable to earn or provide himself with a livelihood; that the said Franklin Gum was a mere youth at the time he entered the service of the United States Government in the Civil War; that he was when a youth and young man and always has been a person of subnormal intellect, but harmless and law-abiding.

"Deponent further says that he verily and sincerely believes and feels that because of the honorable service of the said Franklin Gum in the Civil War and his honorable discharge from the United States Navy at the close of the period of his enlistment and his subsequent reenlistment in the Army that he should be reinstated to the pension roll of the United States Government, from which he was stricken in 1895.

"And deponent further says that he verily believes that the failure of the said Franklin Gum to return to his command in the Army and receive his discharge therefrom after the surrender of General Lee in 1865 was due solely to the fact of the extreme youth of the said Franklin Gum at that time, the condition of his health and mind, and his failure to understand what was required of him, and not through any desire on the part of the said Franklin Gum to refract any of the laws of the United States or to evade any duties required of him, and that the said Franklin Gum then honestly believed that the war was over and that his services were no longer required in the Army, and that nothing further in reference to his enlistment in the Army was required of him.

"A. A. WILES.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of October, A. D. 1921.

"[SEAL.] "WILBUR E. HURLBUT,
"Notary Public, Wisconsin.

"My commission expires April 2, 1922."

In view of the fact that Gum completed his enlistment period in the Navy and was honorably discharged therefrom, and also that the affidavits submitted testify that Gum suffered from illness at the time of his furlough and did not later believe that it was necessary for him to return because the war was over, and also because of the mental condition of Gum as sworn to by the persons making affidavits, your committee recommends that the bill be passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the reading, with a view to further investigating the matter I shall object to the immediate consideration of the bill, because it appears that this man was a deserter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

ELI N. SONNENSTRAHL.

The bill (S. 1280) for the relief of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. The amendment of the Committee on Claims proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That the claim of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl, of Brooklyn, N. Y., for such further sum as he may be entitled to recover, as added to the amount he has already received, for certain beans commandeered by the Navy Department, at San Francisco, Calif., on or about February, 1918, may be sued for and submitted to the United States District Court in and for the Eastern District of New York, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for such amount and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of said Sonnenstrahl upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases under section 10 of the Lever Act, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That suit shall be brought and commenced within four months from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think the letter in the last part of the report, signed by the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, covers the ground.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to have an explanation from the Senator from New York as to this bill.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the beans that are referred to in this bill were owned by one Eli N. Sonnenstrahl. He offered to sell them to the Government at cost. The Government refused to take them; but in 1918, without notice, the Government commandeered these beans, and paid him some $22,000 for them. He claims that they were worth $26,000. At any rate, the Government refused to pay him more than they tendered him. Subsequently, however, in negotiations with the Navy Department, they offered to give him an additional sum of $472.66. He believed he was entitled to something like $2,851. He asks the right to sue for that amount.

Mr. KING. It is a question of ascertaining the value of property which the Government commandeered?

Mr. CALDER. It is.

Mr. KING. The Government feels that the claimant is entitled to $400 more?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; and he thinks he is entitled to $2,815.28.

Mr. KING. And he wants the right to sue the Government?

Mr. CALDER. That is all he asks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKinley	Smoot
Ball	Glass	McLean	Spencer
Bayard	Gooding	McNary	Stanley
Borah	Harreld	Moses	Sterling
Brookhart	Harris	Nelson	Sutherland
Calder	Harrison	New	Swanson
Cameron	Heflin	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Hitchcock	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Colt	Keyes	Owen	Wadsworth
Couzens	King	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	La Follette	Pomerene	Warren
Dial	Lodge	Ransdell	Weller
Dillingham	McCormick	Robinson	Williams
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sheppard	Willis
George	McKellar	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will report the next bill on the calendar.

HARRY E. FISKE.

The bill (S. 4191) for the relief of Harry E. Fiske, was announced as next in order and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,689.35 to Harry E. Fiske, on account of injuries received at the Watertown Arsenal, through no fault of his own, while testing a gun carriage on January 6, 1916.

Mr. DIAL. I notice from the report in this case that the beneficiary has received compensation, and this is a bill to give him additional compensation. I wonder if Congress wants to follow that policy. It occurs to me that it would be unwise.

Mr. LODGE. This is the case of a man who was blinded for life by an accident at the Watertown Arsenal. The passage of the bill is recommended by the War Department. The man did not have the benefit then of the workmen's compensation act, and this is a bill to settle his claim. It has been approved by the department. It is a case where the claimant deserves this additional $5,000, which, without this bill, he would not receive.

I ask that there be substituted for the bill just read House bill 10529, a bill on the calendar, passed by the House, for the relief of the claimant and reported favorably by the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 10529) for the relief of Harry E. Fiske, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,689.35 to Harry E. Fiske on account of injuries received at the Watertown Arsenal, through no fault of his own, while testing a gun carriage on January 6, 1916.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that Senate bill 4191 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES.

The bill (S. 4313) for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to claimants named in this act the several sums appropriated herein, for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army, namely:

To Mary Bauman, Lancaster, Calif., $1,048.75; to R. W. Eubanks, Atlanta, Ga., $842.28; to William R. Midgley, Oceanport, N. J., $538; to Standard Shipbuilding Corporation, New York City, $3,921.59; to Lord Dry Dock Corporation, Weehawken, N. J., $1,034.55; to Fred E. Jones, New York City, $13,457.64; to Stephenson & Bills, Lakewood, N. J., $2,211.90; to B. F. Jones estate, Pittsburgh, Pa., $596.06; to W. S. Lloyds (Inc.), New York City, $890.33; to Firemen's Fund Insurance Co., New York City, $890.33; to St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., New York City, $890.33; to Mrs. W. D. Holman (estate of Moses Samuels), Lakewood, N. J., $13,368.18; to Dominion of Canada, Ottawa, Canada, $1,200; to James R. Sutton, Kempton, Ill., $850; to Arabella D. Huntington, New York City, $524.27; to Porto Rico Coal Co., San Juan, P. R., $1,000; to the New York State Fair Commission, Syracuse, N. Y., $12,098.25; to Riverside Contracting Co., Brooklyn, N. Y., $8,893.01; to Charles Jensen, Omaha, Nebr., $1,038.50; to Cornell Steamboat Co., New York City, $1,235; to Southern Transportation Co., Philadelphia, Pa., $651; to Joe A. Ottman, Mercedes, Tex., $512.20; to Silver Lake Park Co., Atlanta, Ga., $18,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this is a matter which was sent to us by the Budget a year ago, and also this year. All of these are claims which have been audited, but under a clause included in an appropriation last year all claims amounting to more than $5,000 were made subject to subsequent legislation. Hence this list of claims was sent to the Committee on Claims and acted on favorably by that committee. We have passed this same list of claims twice in appropriation bills, but they have gone out in conference. All of them are adjudicated claims, and among them is one for a sum due the Dominion of Canada. All the claimants should have their money; they have been waiting a long time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming if this is not supposed to be clean-up of all the claims for damages caused in the various cantonments during the war? There are two claims covered by House bills for damages to cranberry bogs in my State. The damage was caused by firing from Camp Dix, and I ask why those claims are not included. They have been passed upon and approved by the War Department, and this is supposed to be an omnibus bill carrying all those claims. Will not the Senator allow those to be added to this bill as amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming having already spoken once on the bill, if he speaks again it will have to be in the time of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. The claims spoken of by the Senator from New Jersey do not seem to have reached the same point the others have reached, although from letters in his possession, which I have seen, it would seem as if they had been adjudicated up to a certain point and would probably go through at some other time. I personally believe the claims are good, but I have not as much information regarding them as I have with respect to the others.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the bill be amended by adding a new paragraph at the end of the bill, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lee C. Davis, of Wrightstown, N. J., the sum of $1,807.61, for damages by fire on June 11, 1921, to certain cranberry bogs adjacent to the rifle range at Camp Dix, N. J.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now move that the bill be further amended by adding, after the amendment just agreed to, the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas N. Emley, of Cookstown, N. J., the sum of $7,040.08, for damages by fire on June 11, 1921, to certain cranberry bogs adjacent to the rifle range at Camp Dix, N. J.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator that if he wishes to have the first amendment go through, he had better withhold the one just suggested. The latter amendment has not reached the same point in consideration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withdraw the amendment just offered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in my time I would like to have the Senator from Wyoming explain the liability of the Government. I am not sure as to the basis of these claims against the Government.

Mr. WARREN. The claims are all right. The laws provided for the settlement of them and similar claims under the Lever Act and the other acts. They are being settled, and have very largely been settled, but when it came down to the last ones, where there were different points which required investigation, they were very carefully investigated, but a clause in an appropriation bill really repealed all legislation theretofore passed for any claim amounting to over $5,000. These amounts were grouped together, and consequently they amounted to some eighty or ninety odd thousand dollars, and they have been eliminated from the usual payments and sent to Congress by the Budget Bureau. They have been twice put in appropriation bills, because they are as much due as any other obligation of the Government.

Mr. KING. I understand these are valid claims against the Government. Are they under contracts or for torts?

Mr. WARREN. They are in payment of damages caused at various places by the Army, in camp, training, and so forth.

Mr. KING. And each one has been investigated?

Mr. WARREN. Each has been investigated.

Mr. KING. The Budget has approved them?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; there is a list of some 25 of them.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOWARD R. GURNEY.

The bill (S. 4333) for the relief of Howard R. Gurney was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

E. J. REYNOLDS.

The bill (S. 4345) for the relief of E. J. Reynolds was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Utah withhold his objection a moment? I want to call his attention to the favorable report from the department, and also, if I may, bring his attention more particularly to the facts of the case. The department recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury recommends it or not. In a letter from Secretary Mellon, appearing on page 3 of the report, he states:

A protest was filed by Mr. Reynolds against the liquidation under the provisions of paragraph N, section 3 of the tariff act of 1919, which protest was forwarded to the department by the collector under date of July 9, 1920. The claim was made that the entry should be liquidated under the provisions of paragraph Y.

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator will read the later letter, under date of May 9, 1922, a year after that, which he will find on page 2 of the report, he will see that the department are in favor of the passage of the bill. The Senator is reading an old letter, under date of May 12, 1921. A year later, after they had the facts before them, they favored the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over temporarily, and I will read the whole report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

W. ERNEST JARVIS.

The bill (S. 4366) for the relief of W. Ernest Jarvis was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, let the bill be read.

The reading clerk read the bill.

Mr. KING. I will be glad to have an explanation from the Senator from Delaware as to the liability of the District and the Government of the United States in this case.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, this is a case where there was a girl, an inmate of the National Training School for Girls, who was paroled in the custody of Mr. Smith, and while in his custody was taken sick and died.

Mr. Smith was ordered by the institution to take care of the funeral expenses, thinking there was no doubt that the appropriation for the National Training School for Girls would cover such expenses, but the Comptroller General decided that the appropriation act was so ordered that only expenses incurred while actually an inmate of the National Training School could be taken care of. Therefore there is no way for the undertaker to be paid except through some measure of this kind.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if the young girl had died while an inmate of the home who would have made payment?

Mr. BALL. There could not be any question about it then, and there has not been any question in the past.

Mr. KING. Did the young girl have any parents or guardians who were able to pay the expense?

Mr. BALL. I know nothing about the condition of the girl. She had been an inmate at some time and had been paroled to Mr. Smith, and it was supposed, of course, that the same law controlled the payment of such expenses while the girl was under parole as if she had actually been in the institution.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to W. Ernest Jarvis the sum of $97.50, 60 per cent thereof to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum being the claim of said W. Ernest Jarvis covering undertaker's services for and burial expenses of Willie L. Byers, late an inmate of the National Training School for Girls, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF OWNER OF OLD DOMINION PIER A.

The bill (H. R. 369) for the relief of the owner of Old Dominion Pier A was announced as next in order.

The reading clerk read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice in the report that the department said:

The records of the department show that the U. S. S. West Corum struck and damaged the Old Dominion Pier A on or about June 7, 1919, but it appears that the accident was not due to any negligence or carelessness on the part of those in charge of the vessel, which was forced against the pier by a heavy and sudden squall.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will read further he will see that the Secretary of the Navy said, too, that they did not have steam up as required by the rules and regulations. If they had had steam up, the waves and storm would not have driven it against the pier. He said there was no negligence on the part of the officers, but they did not have the vessel under steam and could not manage it.

Mr. SMOOT. Further on it is stated:

It is believed that there is a serious question as to whether or not the accident may not be considered as inevitable, for which no responsibility can be attached to the West Corum.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will read further, he will see that the department recommends that the bill be passed, that there is an issue as to whether the failure of the officers to have steam up was not the cause of the accident when the storm and wind came up, so that the vessel became helpless and was driven against the pier. If they had had steam up there would not have been any trouble. The rules require that steam shall be kept up, and it is a question to be determined by the court as to whether it ought to be or not. There has never been any failure in cases of this kind, so far as I know, to refer them to the Court of Claims.

Mr. SMOOT. The report also states:

The United States steamship West Corum was not assisted in getting away from the pier subsequent to the collision, but hove up anchor and proceeded to a safe anchorage under her own power.

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary recommends the passage of the bill because that is an issue for the court to determine.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Government of the United States to go to any further expense if we are not responsible for the accident, and I can not see anything here which shows that the Government is responsible.

Mr. SWANSON. How are we going to determine it except by reference to the Court of Claims? The Secretary recommends the passage of the bill. The House passed it. The vessel had no right to have steam down and be absolutely helpless, because if a storm arose the waves might cause just such an accident. The officers did all they could, but the vessel was not in condition to prevent the accident.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see anything in the report to justify the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

Mr. SWANSON. Here is what the Secretary of the Navy said:

However, it is believed that the claimant is entitled to have the case passed upon by a court of claims, and it is respectfully recommended that bill H. R. 369 receive favorable consideration and action.

That is the only way the question can be determined as to whether or not the vessel was at fault for not having steam up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Utah to object?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

NOLAN P. BENNER.

The bill (H. R. 3836) for the relief of Nolan P. Benner was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

HENRY PETERS.

The bill (H. R. 7583) for the relief of Henry Peters was announced as next in order, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Henry Peters, a citizen of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused to the derrick boat Pelican, property of the said Henry Peters, while in tow of the United States Navy tug Barnett on July 2, 1918, may be sued for by the said Henry Peters in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Louisiana, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Henry Peters, or against the said Henry Peters in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is a bill identical with the bill (H. R. 369) which just went over on the objection of the Senator from Utah. I object to the consideration of the bill. I do not think when two bills of the same character are presented to the Senate one should go over on objection and the other be passed. It is the same question as to whether or not a vessel that lets its steam go down and can not operate under its own power is responsible for an accident that may ensue.

Mr. KING. I object to the consideration of the bill for the present. I want to have a chance to look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

OVERTIME SERVICES OF POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I did not remember that the Senate would meet at 11 o'clock this morning and that we would take up the Calendar, and hence was not here until just a few moments ago. I understand that Calendar Nos. 996 and 997 were passed over on objection. I concede that Calendar No. 996 might lead to some discussion, although I would like very much to see it passed. I do not want to urge its consideration at this time, but I have talked with the Senator who objected to the consideration of Calendar No. 997, the bill (S. 4248) to fix the compensation of employees in post offices for overtime services performed in excess of eight hours daily, and, as I understand it, he withdraws his objection. I think no one can object to the passage of the bill when he understands the real situation.

Under the reclassification law of a year or two ago an attempt was made to grant extra pay for overtime services in the departments. The committee were against it but did provide that the employees in the Railway Postal Service should have pay at the regular rate for overtime. For some reason or other a mistake was made, so that now the regular clerks in the employ of the Government in first and second class offices get less pay for overtime than they get for regular work. The latter is estimated on the basis of a certain number of hours for the year and the overtime for a greater number of hours by the year.

What we have attempted to do, under the advice of the department and by the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, was to provide that the regular clerks in the employ of the Government should receive the same pay for overtime that they receive for regular time. There can be nothing of an injustice in the recognizing of their basis of pay for the payment of overtime. The bill simply provides for that and, as I said, has the recommendation of the Postmaster General. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to Calendar No. 997, Senate bill 4248, and act upon it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent, the objection having been withdrawn, that the Senate consider Senate bill 4248. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate as in the Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter clerks and other employees in post offices, entitled by law to compensation for service performed in excess of eight hours daily, shall be paid for such overtime service on the basis of annual pay received by such employee: Provided, That in computing such overtime the annual salary or compensation of such employee shall be divided into 12 equal installments, one of which shall be the pay for each calendar month which, in turn, shall be divided by the number of days in the month less all Sundays and legal holidays enumerated in the act of July 28, 1916, occurring in the month; the quotient thus obtained will be the daily compensation which, divided by eight, will give the hourly compensation for overtime service. All laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Michigan to what extent the department employs its clerks in overtime work, and what is the relative cost?

Mr. TOWNSEND. During the year before last and last year about $2,000,000 was paid for overtime services. The amount so paid was reduced materially during the last year and the Postmaster General reports that he expects to reduce overtime services by one-half during the coming year.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether the bill will extend to janitors and custodians of post-office buildings?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It would extend to all employees whose salaries are limited by the eight-hour provision covered under the reclassification act of 1920 or 1921. It is simply to make clear what was evidently the intent of the Congress, not to make an exception of railway postal clerks, not to reduce the pay for overtime from what they had asked, they having asked for time and a half and we having granted them the same pay that they received for regular services. That is what the bill attempts to do.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK VUMBACA.

The bill (S. 1103) for the relief of Frank Vumbaca was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Vumbaca, of Portland, Me., the sum of $419, to reimburse him for damages to his house, No. 469 Washington Avenue, Portland, Me., caused by concussion from blasts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD N. M'CARTY.

The bill (S. 3071) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Edward N. McCarty was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will withdraw his objection to the consideration of the bill in order that I may make a short explanation relative to it.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection pending an explanation of the bill by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McKINLEY. I know the man who is the proposed beneficiary of the bill. I knew him at the time the injury referred to in the bill occurred. He was a clerk in the post office at Mattoon, Ill., and the injury was occasioned by the fault of the Government and not in any way to any fault of his. It was the result of tinsel on post cards getting into his eye. Congress subsequently passed a law preventing such cards being transmitted through the mails. The bill provides that he shall receive the compensation which is now allowed under the law for such injuries. I hope that the bill may be passed.

Mr. KING. What was the extent of the injury—was it permanent?

Mr. McKINLEY. As the result of the injury he became totally blind.

Mr. KING. And his blindness resulted solely from the accident?

Mr. McKINLEY. Yes.

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Edward N. McCarty, a former employee in the post office in Mattoon, Ill., the provision of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL H. BUTLER.

The bill (S. 4085) for the relief of Samuel H. Butler was announced as next in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $170.40 to Samuel H. Butler, late United States commissioner at Ardmore, Okla., as a refund of money earned by him for services rendered as ex officio justice of the peace, which he was required by the Attorney General to deposit in the United States Treasury contrary to existing law at that time, and the amount necessary to carry out the purposes of this act is hereby appropriated.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like an explanation of the bill. It seems to me it provides for double compensation.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, Samuel H. Butler, the claimant under this bill, was ex officio a commissioner in the Territory of Oklahoma before the Territory attained statehood. Under the law particularly applicable to that Territory as such he was also authorized to act ex officio as justice of the peace and notary public. There were several such officers who collected certain fees pertaining to their offices as justices of the peace and as notaries public. After Oklahoma was admitted to statehood the Department of Justice called on those officers to pay into the Treasury the fees which they had received. One of those officers, as I know, refused to do so, but Mr. Butler complied with the request of the department. The court afterwards decided in an action which was brought by the Government against the officer who did not pay his fees into the Treasury that he was entitled to retain those fees; but Mr. Butler in the meantime had paid his fees into the Treasury. This bill is simply for the purpose, in accordance with that decision of the court, of reimbursing him for the fees thus paid by him.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma if this is the case to which the Senator from Arkansas objected the other day, upon the ground that the claimant was seeking compensation for work done in two capacities, although the law forbade him exercising jurisdiction in both capacities?

Mr. HARRELD. He was specifically allowed to exercise these two functions, and the courts have since held that the man who did not pay in his fees in compliance with the order of the Department of Justice was justified in refusing to do so. I do not think the question has ever been up before in the Senate, because the bill has only been on the calendar for a few days.

Mr. KING. When did the claim accrue?

Mr. HARRELD. It accrued before Oklahoma was admitted to statehood, in 1905 or 1906. The bill, however, has been pending in the House of Representatives several times since that date.

Mr. KING. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but it seems to me its passage will afford a very bad precedent.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. G. CREWS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the calendar, being the bill (S. 4218) for the relief of E. G. Crews, having been adversely reported from the Committee on Claims, without objection the adverse report will be agreed to, and, without objection, the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Chair hears no objection.

ELIZABETH M'KELLER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4254) for the relief of Elizabeth McKeller, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$10,000" and to insert "$2,500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Elizabeth McKeller the sum of $2,500, payment in full as compensation for injuries sustained while traveling within the Navajo Indian Reservation, State of New Mexico, September 7, 1921.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Let the report on this bill be read, unless there shall be some explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I think I can explain the bill in very much less time than the report can be read.

Mr. KING. I shall be very glad to hear the explanation of the bill by the Seator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, the lady who is the claimant in this case was traveling with her husband along a Government-built and Government-owned road between Gallup and Tohatchi, in New Mexico. There was a bridge across an arroyo which had been washed out at that point. No sign was erected there to indicate that the bridge was missing. In the darkness this lady, with her husband, drove over the embankment and into the arroyo. The automobile was, of course, wrecked, and the lady was very badly and permanently injured. The claim has resulted by reason of those injuries. The bill has been examined by the Department of the Interior and has been approved by that department. After a very careful examination of all the papers and evidence in the case I thought that she was entitled not to the full amount for which she made claim, but to $2,500. I reported the bill favorably because I thought her claim was entitled to favorable consideration for that amount.

Mr. KING. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether any appreciable time had elapsed after the bridge was carried away by the flood and the time when the accident occurred?

Mr. NEW. No.

Mr. KING. Then, was there any negligence on the part of the Government?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. KING. Because it would be an act of God, perhaps.

Mr. NEW. No; it was not. The rangers had notified the authorities that the bridge was missing, but no sign had been erected by the agents, and Mr. and Mrs. McKeller had no means in the darkness of perceiving that the bridge had been washed away.

Mr. KING. What discipline or what punishment did the Department of the Interior inflict upon this negligent agent of the Government?

Mr. NEW. Oh, Mr. President, I do not know.

Mr. KING. One further inquiry: Is the sum of money to be paid under this bill, if it shall be passed, to be charged against the funds of the Indians or is it to be paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. NEW. It is to be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. KING. Was this road one which was built for the benefit of the Indians or was it a military road of the Government?

Mr. NEW. It was part of the park system and not for the Indians. The damages would not be properly charged to their funds at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INDEFINITELY POSTPONED.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the calendar being the bill (S. 3854) for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the National Bank of Cleburne, Tex., has been adversely reported from the Committee on Claims. Without objection, the adverse report will be agreed to, and the bill be stricken from the calendar.

ANTTI MERIHELMI.

The bill (S. 1517) for the relief of Antti Merihelmi was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, that bill ought not to be allowed to pass. I have no objection to its coming to a vote, but I think the bill should be defeated. The report of the board of Army officers who investigated this matter says:

(a) That any and all claims against the United States arising out of the foregoing circumstances be not allowed.

That is the statement of the Government officials who investigated the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from South Carolina to object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make a brief explanation?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DIAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this bill as originally introduced proposed to pay to the beneficiary $5,000. The committee struck out "$5,000" and inserted "$500." There is no doubt that the claimant in the case was run over by an Army truck. The officers appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate the accident say he was run over, but they add that, in their judgment, he contributed to some extent to the accident himself. However, in their report they say:

That the driver of the Government truck did not have his truck under the proper control necessitated by the crowded condition of the traffic, and to this extent contributed to this accident and to this extent is responsible.

There is no doubt about this man being laid up in the hospital; there is no doubt that he was run over by an Army truck and injured, and the committee believed that for the loss of his time he should be compensated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor and has yielded to the Senator from New York. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield now to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. DIAL. When the Senator from New York concludes I will yield to the Senator from Utah for a question.

Mr. KING. Then, I had better take the floor in my own time.

Mr. CALDER. So I say, Mr. President, that while the conclusions of the board appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate this case is against allowing this claim, it is quite clear from their own statement that the driver of the truck was in part to blame. Under the amendment reported to the bill, it is proposed to allow the claimant but $500. He was confined to the hospital and lost his pay, and it seems to me the amount awarded is quite small compared to the loss which he actually suffered.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it is not a question about the man; the question is, Is any amount due when the Government is not responsible? The board of Army officers further found:

(d) That Antti Merihelmi crossed the street without paying proper heed to the traffic, and so contributed to his own injury.
(e) That the board is of the opinion that Antti Merihelmi is not suffering from any permanent disability whatsoever.

No bones were broken; the claimant paid no attention to the traffic; the truck was only running 2 or 3 miles an hour; and the man who was injured himself got in the way of it and brought about his own injury, and therefore is not entitled to recover.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

ARTHUR FROST.

The bill (S. 661) for the relief of Arthur Frost was announced as next in order, and the bill was read.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, I should like to make a brief statement concerning the bill.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I personally know the facts in this case. I know right where the accident occurred in Oklahoma City and I know when it occurred. I heard all about it the next morning, for it occurred right across the street from the hotel at which I was living at that time. One of the soldiers from Fort Sill during the war, while chasing a deserter down an alley by what is known as the city jail in Oklahoma City, fired his gun. He claimed he fired in the air to make the deserter stop, but the bullet struck Arthur Frost, an innocent bystander. The soldier was engaged in the performance of his duty. I repeat I know all about the facts in this case. It is a just claim, and the bill should certainly pass, in my opinion.

Mr. KING. That is, it is a just claim if the Government is responsible for all the torts and wrongdoings of every soldier and every employee of the Government.

Mr. HARRELD. The soldier was performing a duty for the Government. I do not see why the Government should not be held to the same strict accountability that an individual is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Arthur Frost the sum of $960 in full for damages suffered by reason of being negligently shot and seriously injured by a regularly enlisted soldier of the United States while in pursuit of a deserter and in the legal discharge of his duty as a military policeman.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNE C. SHYMER.

The bill (H. R. 6134) for relief of estate of Anne C. Shymer was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object to the bill, if there is an explanation of it I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I was chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Claims to which the bill was referred. I told the claimant she would have to produce additional testimony as to the value of the jewelry. She complied with that demand. The facts in the case are that the package of jewelry was recovered from the Lusitania and passed into the hands of our consul at London. That consul was directed to send it to those who were entitled to receive it, but it disappeared in transit. There is no proof showing that the consul himself was guilty of any laches. He says he sent it by express or by the usual method, but according to the proof the jewelry was lost in the mails; at any rate it disappeared after it was delivered to the United States consul at London. As chairman of the subcommittee I recommended that the amount be paid. The full committee indorsed that recommendation and reported the bill.

Mr. KING. I think that the Government of the United States under the circumstances is not liable. It is a matter that ought to be further investigated, it occurs to me, particularly in view of the fact that a commission is considering all these claims. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

STEAMSHIP "MOHICAN."

The bill (S. 4310) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Mohican was announced as next in order.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has objected to that class of cases. I have had several of them, and I think they all ought to stand or fall together; and I ask that this bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STEAM LIGHTER "COMPORT."

The bill (S. 4311) for the relief of the owners of the steam lighter Comport was announced as next in order.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the same kind of a bill, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the only way in which these people can have any relief at all is to give them a standing in the Court of Claims.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say to the Senator that I have advocated that. Five or six bills of that kind that I introduced have been passed over. They are bills that have passed the House unanimously, and have been reported to the Senate; but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objects to that class of bills. I am not going to let him let other bills of that character pass and object to mine.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. All I want to say to the Senator is this: In this particular class of cases a Government boat sometimes collides with a boat of some individual, and, of course, it is not a matter of contract. If it were a matter of contract, they could appear in the Court of Claims anyhow; but there is only one way in which an innocent owner can be relieved in this class of cases, and that is to give him a standing in the court where he can present his case; that is all.

Mr. SWANSON. I agree with the Senator. I have had about a dozen passed at this session, and I have about a dozen more of this kind; but the Senator from Utah objects to that class of cases being referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication. If we are going to have that done with some of them, it ought to be done with all of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator from Virginia would accomplish more result by objecting to the bills of the Senator from Utah; but I do not see how the Senator from Virginia affects the Senator from Utah by objecting to this bill.

Mr. SWANSON. No; I am not objecting to the bills of the Senator from Utah. I simply think all cases of this class ought to be treated alike.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the objection of the Senator from Virginia, the bill will be passed over.

BLATTMANN & CO.

The bill (S. 3701) for the relief of Blattmann & Co., was announced as next in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$145,526" and insert "$124,383.86," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $124,383.86 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of compensating Blattmann & Co., of Waedenswil, Switzerland, for losses sustained through the wrongful seizure and sale of 1,057,100 pounds of devitalized gluten by the Alien Property Custodian of the United States, which belonged to the said Blattmann & Co.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I want to say just a word about this bill. It is a claim against the Alien Property Custodian for compensation for property taken by him during the war. I believe the claim to be entirely just, but since this report was made the committee which reported it has been informed that there is a letter of some kind which is in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian which the committee did not see and of which it did not hear at the time the bill was being considered. I, therefore, as one of the committee that reported the bill, suggest that it be referred back to the committee, in order that we may see what substance there is in the report that has come to us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF OWNER OF OLD DOMINION PIER A.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, referring back to House bill 369, for the relief of the owner of Old Dominion Pier A, I have read the report clear through. The only real objection that I had to the bill was because it contained the words "and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs." In the past, until just lately, so I am informed, we have always stricken out those words, "to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages." The clerk at the desk tells me that of late these bills have been passing through with the words "to enter a judgment or decree" in them. If that is the case, and if that is the policy of Congress, I have no objection to this bill or to the other bills of the same kind.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that I have a great many cases of this kind arising in Norfolk and Newport News, growing out of collisions with vessels of the Government. The facts are stated very briefly, a summary of the evidence, and a judgment is entered giving the facts as they have been agreed on, and then the amount of damage sustained. This is the language used for all of them. I think every bill on the calendar has the same language.

Mr. SMOOT. I have stood on the floor of the Senate and had not 1 but 20 or 30 or 40 bills passed with those words stricken out, but I am informed that of late the bills have passed with that language in them; and in view of that fact, I have no objection to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the Senate recur to the consideration of House bill 369. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I think the Chair ought to include in that request Senate bill 4310 and Senate bill 4311.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that he intends to do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, some misapprehension concerning the attitude of the Senate with respect to these matters may be inferred from the remarks made by the Senator from Utah. There are two distinct classes of these cases. One class is such as this now under consideration, where, when the facts are established, no one can doubt what the law applicable to them shall be. In these collision cases, if it is found that the Government vessel was negligent, there is nothing to do except to pay the bill; that is all; and there is no reason why the judgment of the Court of Claims should not be entered. There is another class of cases, however, which we often refer to the Court of Claims, in respect to which we do not admit a liability even if the facts are against us. There it is unwise, as a matter of law——

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McNARY. If there is going to be a controversy over this matter I shall object to the request made by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to conclude what I have to say.

We shall presently consider the case of a claim that is to be referred to the Court of Claims for the purpose of finding the facts. The court is not authorized to enter any judgment, because we do not concede that there is a liability against the United States even if the facts are found against us or found as the claimant asks; but in all these cases of collision it seems to me it would be foolish to refer the matter to the Court of Claims and then again trouble Congress with it when the court finds that the Government boat is responsible for the injury.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong when he makes the statement that that has not been the practice in the past.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I do not say that.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, if we can do so without discussion—because I think these are meritorious bills, and they were passed over under a misapprehension—that the Senate may consider Orders of Business 1016, 1018, 1028, and 1029.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the Senate recur to the consideration of Orders of Business 1016, 1018, 1028, and 1029. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 369) for the relief of the owner of Old Dominion Pier A.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY PETERS.

The bill (H. R. 7583) for the relief of Henry Peters was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP "MOHICAN."

The bill (S. 4310) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Mohican was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Clyde Steamship Co., a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Maine, with its principal place of business in the city and State of New York, owners of the steamship Mohican, for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the United States tug Barlow on the 31st day of July, 1919, while said steamship Mohican was moored at Pier No. 2, Empire Stores, Brooklyn, N. Y., may be sued for and submitted to the United States District Court in and for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules in admiralty governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said steamship Mohican, or against the owners of the said steamship Mohican in favor of the United States and upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM LIGHTER "COMPORT."

The bill (S. 4311) for the relief of the owners of the steam lighter Comport was considered as in Committee of the Whole and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., a corporation organized under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Maine, with its principal place of business in the city and State of New York, owners of the steam lighter Comport, for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said vessel and the United States steam lighter President, now called the General Sawtelle, on the 1st day of March, 1919, near Piers Nos. 13 and 14, East River, N. Y., may be sued for and submitted to the United States District Court in and for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules in admiralty governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said steam lighter Comport, or against the owners of the said steam lighter Comport in favor of the United States, and upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONVENTION OF MYSTIC SHRINE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 266) authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 4, line

2, after the word "spaces," to insert "under his control," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits to Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923, Shrine Committee (Inc.), for the use of any parks, reservations, or other public spaces in the District of Columbia, under his control, on the occasion of the forty-ninth annual session of the Imperial Council, Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, in the month of June, 1923: Provided, That in his opinion, such use will inflict no serious or permanent injuries upon such parks, reservations, public spaces, or statuary therein; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate, for such and other purposes on the occasion before named, such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the said District of Columbia, under their control, as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands, arches, or platforms that may be erected on the public spaces aforesaid, including such as may be erected in connection with any display of fireworks, shall be under the supervision of the said Almas Temple Shrine Committee and in accordance with plans and designs to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds: And provided further, That the reservations or public spaces occupied by the stands or other structures shall be promptly restored to their condition before such occupancy, and the said committee shall indemnify the War Department and the District of Columbia for damage of any kind whatsoever upon such reservation or space by reason of such use.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to loan to the said committee such tents, camp appliances, and other necessities, hospital furniture and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the United States as in their judgment may be spared at the time of the session: Provided, That the said Shrine committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage to such tents, appliances, etc., as aforesaid, not necessarily incident to such use: And provided further, That the said committee shall give approved bond to do the same.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized to loan to the said committee such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., belonging to the United States (battle flags excepted) as are not then in use and may be suitable and proper for decorations and other purposes, which may be spared without detriment to the public service; such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., to be used by the committee under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by the said Secretaries, or either of them: Provided, That the said committee shall, within five days after the close of said session, return to the said Secretaries all such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., thus loaned; and said committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage not necessarily incident to such use.

SEC. 4. That the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized to permit the use of any or all public parks, reservations, or other public spaces under his control in the District of Columbia for use by said committee for parking automobiles, the temporary erection of tents for entertainments, hospitals, and other purposes; and said committee is hereby authorized to charge reasonable fees for entertainment and accommodations on said parks, reservations, or other public spaces to aid in meeting the necessary expenses incident to the session.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit said committee to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports, wherever necessary and in the nearest practicable connection with the present supply of light, for the purpose of effecting special illumination: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents after June 10, 1923, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the public spaces, streets, and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before June 15, 1923: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced; that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public; and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: And provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removing of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia, and that if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illuminating or other purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervison of the officer in charge of said park or reservation.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to grant, under such conditions as they may impose, special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia during said session, and to charge for such privileges such fees as they may deem proper.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the telegraph and telephone companies to extend overhead wires to such points as shall be deemed necessary by the said committee, the said wires to be taken down within 10 days after the conclusion of the session.

SEC. 8. That the Public Buildings Commission is hereby authorized to assign to said committee for use and occupancy during said session such unoccupied public buildings in the District of Columbia as, in its discretion, may appear advisable: Provided, That any and all buldings so assigned shall be surrendered within 10 days after the close of the said session: And provided further, That the said committee shall furnish a bond or other satisfactory assurance of indemnity against damage to said property while in its possession, incidental wear and tear excepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 6, line 8, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 9. The Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia shall not hereafter have or exercise power to fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates in excess of the rates of fare fixed in the existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress; and from and after the passage and approval of this act said street railway companies shall receive 5 cents per passenger as a cash fare, but they shall issue and sell six tickets for 25 cents, as provided in existing charters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I object to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall object to the consideration of the bill, because we can not consider it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon the objection entered by the Senator from Utah, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That may not be done under the unanimous-consent agreement already entered into.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I believe the Chair is correct. I am wholly, solely, and only to blame. I should have been giving attention when that order was entered—that order which prevents the Senate from taking a vote on a bill that will pass if the roll is called.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I can easily pay my fare, 8 cents per transit. It does not distress me to reach the Capitol; but here in the Federal city, where thousands of clerks are assembled to do the Nation's business, they are exploited, not only by being charged 8 cents per transit but exploited by the rapacity of the telephone company, of the electric-light company, of the gas company, in a manner that would put to shame the most rapacious school of sharks that ever sank teeth into human flesh.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] asks how the sharks operate? Do you know what a pilot fish is? On or near every shark is a pilot fish, and without that pilot fish to guide the shark where to find his prey, the shark starves. Who will be the pilot for the sharks to-day?

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. DIAL. What disposition was made of Senate Joint Resolution 266?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was passed over.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] objected to its consideration.

Mr. DIAL. I trust the Senator from Utah will permit the joint resolution to be passed at an early day.

LONGEVITY PAY OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The bill (H. R. 7864) providing for sundry matters affecting the Naval Establishment was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to call the attention to section 12, at the bottom of page 9 of the bill. Section 12 is reported as a committee amendment, and in that amendment it is proposed that officers of the Navy shall count, for purposes of computing increased pay for length of service and for other allowances, the time spent at the Naval Academy as midshipmen. The pay bill of last year, which took care of all the six services, specifically reiterated the provisions of the act of 1916, which brought to a termination the counting of academy service, both at West Point and Annapolis, for the purpose of computing longevity pay. It is utterly unfair to the other services to repeal the law of 1916 and permit naval officers to have the advantage of that increase, when the Congress in 1916 decreed that thereafter they should not have that advantage.

Mr. KING. I have objected to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection of the Senator from Utah the bill will be passed over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Speaking in whatever time I may have on the next bill, I would like to say a word, not for the purpose of expecting the consideration of this measure at this time, but to answer some of the statements made by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the next bill; then the Senator from Washington will be recognized.

The bill (S. 4245) to provide the necessary organization of the Customs Service for an adequate administration and enforcement of the tariff act of 1922, and all other customs revenue laws, was announced as next in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to say, in answer to the remarks of the Senator from New York, that he has not stated all of the circumstances relating to the matter to which the section which he cited of House bill 7864 refers. He has stated only a part of them, and missed the essential objects of this section. It is not true that the law of 1916, or of any other year, prohibited altogether the counting of the time of midshipmen at the Naval Academy in estimating their longevity pay.

The law to which the Senator refers was passed in 1913, instead of 1916; but the trouble about it was that while it provided that all of the midshipmen who graduated after 1916 should not be allowed to count their service at the Naval Academy in the computation of service for the purpose of computing longevity pay, it allowed all those who graduated in 1916 and previous years to count such time. It was not considered important by the Committee on Naval Affairs whether that time is counted or not counted, but it was considered important that all officers in the Navy should be put upon the same basis as to pay.

In 1922 the pay bill to which the Senator from New York refers, which applied to six services, established an entirely new basis of pay for officers of these services. Before the passage of that act pay had been based almost entirely upon rank. After the passage of that act it was based principally upon length of service, and it was the view of the committee that when that new basis was established and the pay which officers of the Navy should receive was based upon the length of service the same method of computing service should be applied to all officers of the Navy; that there should not be one class of officers who, in the average length of expectation of service in the Navy, should receive from $13,000 to $15,000 more in the way of pay and allowances than another set of officers of identical rank and of identical length and character of service. In a word, the committee proposed this measure simply for the purpose of removing this discrimination. It does not make any difference whether you take service in the Naval Academy as a standard upon which pay is computed or some other standard; the object is to obtain a just result, fair pay and allowances, and that there shall be a uniform basis of pay for all officers entering the same services who are of the same rank and have the same length and character of service.

At some other time before the adjournment of the session I will ask the Senate to take up and consider House bill 7864.

ENFORCEMENT OF CUSTOMS REVENUE LAWS.

The bill (S. 4245) to provide the necessary organization of the customs service for an adequate administration and enforcement of the tariff act of 1922, and all other customs revenue laws was next in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 10 and 25 to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26 to the said bill and concurring therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment to insert:

"The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices (not to exceed 200 at any one time) as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate No. 26.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, what is the measure on which the Senator from Wyoming has requested action?

Mr. WARREN. We have just concluded consideration of the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, in which the Senate has concurred, involves the employment of apprentices by the Public Printer. The Senate provided for such apprentices, but the House restricted the number to 200 at any one time. I may say that even before the amendment went to the House we had agreed in conference to restrict the number as provided in the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

AWARD AGAINST THE UNITED STATES IN FAVOR OF NORWAY.

Mr. WARREN. I now wish to submit a report relative to another matter which I think will take but a moment, and if it shall take longer I shall withdraw it.

From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 440) to satisfy the award rendered against the United States by the arbitral tribunal established under the special agreement concluded June 30, 1921, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Norway, and I submit a report (No. 1139) thereon.

The joint resolution proposes to provide for the payment of nearly $12,000,000 to the Norwegian Government, but it appropriates nothing now, for it is to be paid out of an appropriation which we provided for the Shipping Board last year. The sum of $50,000,000 was then appropriated to provide for this and other similar matters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand in reference to the matter now referred to by the Senator from Wyoming that we agreed to submit the case of this Government and the Norwegian Government in relation to their shipping to arbitration at The Hague?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the sum carried in the joint resolution was found to be due by the court of arbitration?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and this proposed legislation is to carry out the award?

Mr. NORRIS. The effect of this joint resolution, as I understand, if passed will be simply to carry out the judgment which was rendered by the court of arbitration?

Mr. WARREN. That s all. I may say by the award of the tribunal itself the judgment bears 6 per cent interest from the time it is rendered, and we wish to stop the payment of the interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Was the dispute with the Norwegian Government directly?

Mr. WARREN. It was with the Norwegian Government, and the matter was decided through arbitration.

Mr. NORRIS. The question was left to arbitration?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the arbitrators found that we were indebted in this amount?

Mr. WARREN. Exactly, and the settlement is satisfactory to both countries.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the payment of claims by the United States Shipping Board, contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," approved June 12, 1922, is made available to the extent required to enable the Secretary of State to satisfy the award rendered against the United States on October 13, 1922, by the arbitral tribunal established under the special agreement concluded June 30, 1921, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Norway. And the Secretary of State is authorized to withhold from the total amount awarded the sum of $22,800 with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from October 13, 1922, to the date of payment of the award, and to pay the claim of Page Bros., American citizens, in accordance with the decision of the arbitral tribunal.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC CO.

The bill (S. 3805) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to ascertain the cost to the Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, and the amounts expended by it from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, in closing and controlling the break in the Colorado River was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Whereas, at request of President Roosevelt and under the stress of great emergency, from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, the Southern Pacific Co. closed and controlled the break in the Colorado River and thereby prevented the overflow and destruction of 1,214,000 acres of irrigable land in the Imperial Valley, in southern California, and saved to the Government the Laguna Dam and the Yuma reclamation project connected therewith in Arizona, as well as thousands of acres of other Government land along the Colorado River: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, against the United States for reimbursement and repayment to such company of the cost to said company and the amounts expended by it from December 1, 1906, to November 20, 1907, in closing and controlling the break in the Colorado River be, and such claim is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, and full jurisdiction is hereby vested in said court to ascertain the amounts actually expended and the actual costs incurred by the said Southern Pacific Co. in closing and controlling said break within said period, what portion of such expenditures or costs protected or saved the company's railroad lines and roadbed, and to report its findings to Congress. In ascertaining aforesaid costs and expenses the court may receive and consider all papers, depositions, records, correspondence, and documents heretofore at any time filed in Congress and in the executive departments of the Government, together with any other evidence offered, and no statute of limitations shall apply.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The bill (H. R. 10003) to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment to strike out all of the bill down to and including line 12, page 3, and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

SEC. 23. (1) That, except as provided in subdivision (2) of this section, when by the terms of the war risk insurance act and any amendments thereto, any payment is to be made to a minor, other than a person in the military or naval forces of the United States, or to a person mentally incompetent, or under other legal disability adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction, such payment shall be made to the person who is constituted guardian, curator, or conservator by the laws of the State or residence of claimant, or is otherwise legally vested with responsibility or care of the claimant or his estate: Provided, That prior to receipt of notice by the United States Veterans' Bureau that any such person is under such other legal disability adjudged by some court of competent jurisdiction, payment may be made to such person direct.

(2) The director, when satisfied after due investigation that any person entitled to receive compensation under Article III of the war risk insurance act is mentally incompetent, may order that all moneys payable to him or her under said article shall be held in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such person. All funds so held shall be disbursed under order of the director and subject to his discretion for the comfort and maintenance of such incompetent, and any surplus remaining in his hands may be used by the director in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by him for the comfort and maintenance of the dependents of the incompetent. If said incompetent be an inmate of any asylum or hospital for the insane maintained by the United States, or by any of the several States or Territories of the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, the director may pay to the chief executive officer of said asylum or hospital in which said person is an inmate such portion of said compensation as the director may deem proper, to be used by such officer for the maintenance and comfort of said inmate, subject to the duty to account to the United States Veterans' Bureau and to repay any surplus in his hands in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the director. Any surplus compensation held by the director under this subdivision shall be invested in interest-bearing securities of the United States. When such incompetent shall be found to be mentally competent or shall die any balance or securities remaining to his credit shall be paid or turned over to the claimant, if living, or to his personal representative, if dead: Provided further, That for the purpose of payments of benefits under Article III of the war risk insurance act, as amended, where no guardian, curator, or conservator of the person under a legal disability has been appointed under the laws of the State or residence of the claimant, the director shall determine the person who is otherwise legally vested with responsibility or care of the claimant or his estate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I would like to have some explanation of this bill and a statement as to whether it is unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. The bill is unanimously reported by the committee, at the urgent request of the Veterans' Bureau. The real purpose of the bill is to cover cases of this kind: There are many instances in which a soldier or sailor has become mentally incapacitated, and is in a hospital for the insane, where there has been no curator appointed, and no one to represent the person so afflicted. The bureau is authorized by this bill to use for his comfort the money that would come under the provisions of the law until some one is appointed to care for him.

Mr. KING. It is not a general revision of the act?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

E. J. REYNOLDS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to return to Order of Business No. 1014, the bill (S. 4345) for the relief of E. J. Reynolds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection

Mr. McNARY. I would like to go forward with the calendar. In going backward we do not get anywhere.

Mr. WILLIS. Objection was made to the consideration of this bill by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], but he has now informed himself as to the facts and will withdraw his objection. It will take very little time to pass the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I object until after action has been had upon Senate bill 4399.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for, and the Secretary will report the next bill on the calendar.

STANDARDS FOR HAMPERS, ETC.

The bill (S. 4399) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time. I have some letters objecting to the passage of the bill and others favoring it. I want to look carefully into the bill and I object to its consideration now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. McNARY. I regret the attitude of the Senator from North Carolina. This legislation has passed the House. It is sought by the consumers, various farm organizations, and producers generally, and I have received many requests from the Senator's own State for early action on the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have some letters favoring it and others against, and I want to know what is best to do about it. So I object to the consideration of the bill until I can look into it. I do not say that I am opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

E. J. REYNOLDS.

Mr. WILLIS. Now that Senate bill 4399 has been disposed of for the present, I renew the request that we return to Order of Business 1014, Senate bill 4345.

Mr. DIAL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina demands the regular order. The Secretary will report the next bill on the calendar.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENSE ACT.

The bill (S. 4132) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," approved April 5, 1918, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be impossible to pass that bill in five minutes, so I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL HARDIN AND CAPTAIN SCHOLL.

The bill (S. 4425) to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States was announced as next in order, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Lieut. Col. Joseph S. Hardin, Finance Department, the sum of $6,779.96, and in the accounts of Capt. P. A. Scholl, Finance Department, the sum of $202.02, which amounts represent public funds which were stolen by a former employee.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. NEW. This bill deals with the cases of two officers who were in charge of the disbursement of Government funds. A civil-service employee, a civilian, with whose appointment they had nothing whatever to do, embezzled about $11,000 worth of public money which was in their charge. He ran away, was captured in Mexico, was brought back to the United States, prosecuted, and convicted. He was under the usual bond of $5,000, which was collected and applied on the amount of the embezzlement. It leaves six thousand and some odd dollars, nearly all of which is chargeable to one of the officers, the remainder, two or three hundred dollars, to the other. The War Department favors the passage of the bill; it is the usual course to follow, and I think the officers should be relieved of responsibility for a theft of which the Government was the real victim and not themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator say that the Secretary of War recommends the passage of the bill?

Mr. NEW. Yes; I said that the War Department recommends its passage.

Mr. DIAL. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that the party who stole the money has been prosecuted and is now in the penitentiary.

Mr. NEW. I so stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it to be the policy of the Government that when an individual steals money, no matter under what conditions, the Government is to repay the officer the amount of money? Why not extend it to everybody in the United States?

Mr. NEW. I tried to make it clear that the man was not there at the behest or order of these officers. He was sent there, and they had to take him whether they wanted to have him or not. He was given to them by the Civil Service Commission. He proved dishonest and stole the money. One of these officers followed him to Mexico——

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 12817.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 14, before the word "vessels" strike out the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to submit the unanimous consent proposal which I offered to the Senate on Saturday, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington desires to have reported the unanimous-consent proposal which he offered on Saturday. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on and after Friday, February 16, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 60 minutes on the shipping bill, or more than once nor longer than 30 minutes on any amendment pending or that may be offered to said bill; and that on and after Tuesday, February 20, if said bill is not sooner disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on said bill or more than once nor longer than 5 minutes on any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I recognize the very great importance of action upon the foreign debt funding bill. That bill was passed by the House with, I think, only one day's consideration. I do not know of any serious objection to it in the Senate. It ought to be acted upon in the Senate without taking very much time. I want to facilitate it in every way that I can. I am going to say now that I am willing, so far as I may, that the Senate shall adjourn from day to day for a couple of days so that we may have the morning hour to devote to that bill, but I also want now to give notice that on Wednesday I shall ask the Senate to remain in session in the evening, at least until 10 or 11 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. When is it expected that the British debt funding bill will be brought before the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have just stated that I am willing to adjourn, when we close our business to-day, until 11 o'clock to-morrow and that that measure might be taken up during the morning hour to-morrow and then, if not disposed of, I would be willing to adjourn to-morrow until the next day, so that at least two hours could be devoted to it on that day. Possibly by that time, if not sooner disposed of, we might be able to reach some agreement or understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. So it is expected that the debt funding bill may be brought forward to-morrow during the morning hour?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing that that may be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator propose to lay aside the pending bill, the unfinished business, until the debt funding bill is disposed of?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Only for the morning hour?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just during the morning hour. I propose to ask the Senate to continue the consideration of the shipping bill until time to quit to-day, and then I shall perhaps move to adjourn instead of recessing. I would be willing to adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. That would give the morning hour of two hours that could be used in the consideration of the debt funding bill. Then, as I said, if not disposed of to-morrow, I would be willing at the close of business to-morrow to adjourn until the next day, so as to give two hours on that day for the consideration of the debt funding bill. It seems to me that with those four hours we ought to get a pretty clear indication as to some arrangement to finally dispose of the debt funding bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. If upon Wednesday it should develop by 1 o'clock, at the close of the morning hour, that there was a likelihood of reaching a vote within a few hours on the debt fund ing bill, I ask the Senator whether he would consent to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily in order that the debt funding bill might be disposed of?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the debt funding bill could be disposed of on Wednesday, I would be perfectly willing to do that.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to present a resolution. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 439) was read as follows:

Whereas it has been reported in several press dispatches and asserted on the floor of the House of Representatives that there is evidence of waste, extravagance, irregularities, and mismanagement in the operation of the United States Veterans' Bureau;

Whereas it has been reported that general dissatisfaction prevails among the officials of said bureau;

Whereas because of such chaotic conditions and lack of coordination it is alleged that officials of said bureau have been removed and others have tendered their resignations;

Whereas the burden of such waste, extravagance, irregularities, and mismanagement falls upon the incapacitated soldier for whose relief said bureau was created; and

Whereas the conditions as alleged to exist would necessarily impair the morale of said bureau: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the special committee appointed under authority of Senate resolution 59, agreed to June 9, 1921, be requested to consider these allegations, in executive session or otherwise, and report to the Senate within seven days:

1. Whether it is feasible and desirable to institute a thorough investigation into the alleged waste, extravagance, irregularities, and mismanagement in the United States Veterans' Bureau; and

2. If said committee is of the opinion that an investigation be instituted that it make such recommendations to the Senate as to the manner and scope of such investigation; and

3. In view of the expiration of the terms of office of several members of said committee on March 4 next, make recommendation as to what committee, if any, should conduct such investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I make a brief statement? A committee already exists that could institute the investigation, a special committee of five, headed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. But the terms of office of three members of the committee expire on March 4, and the committee's existence terminates on that date. Of course no complete or thorough investigation could be conducted in the course of the next three weeks. The resolution simply asks the committee to meet in executive session, if desirable, consider the allegations made, and report back to the Senate whether it is feasible and advisable to have a broad investigation, and by what committee it should be made. In other words, all the resolution asks is that the committee, upon which there are three Republicans and two Democrats, consider it in executive session, if it sees fit, because it is alleged that the Department of Justice is making investigation, and report back to the Senate within the next few days just what should be done by Congress in view of existing conditions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the resolution can be disposed of without discussion, I have no objection to its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter from Congressman LARSEN, of Georgia, dealing with the subject covered by the resolution.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1923.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Of course your attention has been attracted during the past few weeks by the numerous press items regarding extravagance, mismanagement, and, in some instances, corruption alleged to exist in the Veterans' Bureau, both at its central office and in many of the regional and suboffices.

On March 17 last I introduced House Resolution 306, providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate and report on conditions and operations of the Veterans' Bureau in the management and control of claims for compensation, allotments, insurance, and vocational training, and all other matters over which said bureau has jurisdiction, to determine whether or not said bureau is efficient and economical in the management of its affairs, and also generally to investigate and report on all things affecting the welfare, management, and results obtained by the operations of the said bureau at its central office, regional offices, and suboffices.

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, but notwithstanding many efforts to obtain report on same I have been unable to do so.

I notice that you are a member of a Senate committee which seems to be empowered to make such an investigation as is provided for in the resolution introduced by me, and I therefore wonder if you can obtain through this committee such authentic official information as would completely inform the public as to exact conditions existing in the bureau.

There are now employed in the Veterans' Bureau nearly 30,000 persons, at a cost of more than $425,000,000 per annum to the taxpayers, and such charges of extravagance, corruption, and graft should not, therefore, go unnoticed by the Congress. Certainly to furnish the desired information would not be incompatible with the public welfare.

I trust that you may be in position to obtain definite information not only along the lines referred to in the resolution mentioned above but specifically regarding conditions as to rentals of property at Stockton, Calif.; Richmond, Va.; Nauvoo, Ill.; Livermore, Calif.; Goshen, N. Y.; Aspinwall, Pa.; Tupper Lake, Pa.; and North Hampton, Mass.; as well as with reference to the sale of Army supplies at Perryville, Md., all of which has been recently alluded to in press dispatches as aforesaid, and with which, I am sure, you are familiar.

With sentiments of high regard,

Very truly yours, W. W. LARSEN.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN PRESIDENTIAL AND CONGRESSIONAL TERMS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 918, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 253) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution to which he has referred.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I expected to make some explanation of it. It is a joint resolution, as its title states, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It has in it two distinct propositions. One of the propositions relates to the term of office and the method of election of a President and Vice President. The other relates to the fixing of the beginning of the term of office of Members of the House of Representatives and the Senate.

It will be seen, therefore, that while I have coupled them in one resolution and they have been reported that way from the committee, yet they are capable of being separated into two distinct propositions and either one of such propositions could become a part of the resolution without in any way interfering with the other one. I have recognized that the resolution is capable of such a division. While I am just as much in favor of one proposition as the other, I have realized for some time that there was some opposition to one of the propositions both in the Senate and outside. Personally, I do not concede that the opposition is well founded. I do not believe there can be any valid objection made to the elimination of the Electoral College. I have never heard what to my mind was any argument in favor of maintaining and still retaining in our Constitution that fifth wheel of our governmental wagon.

But, Mr. President, I realize that this Congress is drawing to a close, that on the 4th of March all bills, joint resolutions, and other measures that have not received the sanction of both the House and the Senate must fall. I had confidence that a very large number of the legislatures now in session would approve either one or both of the propositions, if submitted to them before they adjourned, but I know that it will be an impossibility to get the joint resolution agreed to in the Senate and in the House during the remainder of this session if there is any substantial opposition to it.

I have agreed, therefore, that so far as I can I will consent to the separation of the two propositions and for the present eliminate all that part of the joint resolution that applies to the Electoral College and the office of President and Vice President, and confine it only to the proposition so far as it applies to Members of the House of Representatives and Members of the Senate. If that be done, section 2 would be left, reading as follows:

That the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election.

It would also leave section 3, which reads as follows——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the motion of the Senator from Nebraska shall prevail, it is his purpose so to modify the joint resolution that the Senate shall consider the question of advancing the time when Senators and Representatives shall assume their duties from March 4, as now provided under the Constitution, to January 1?

Mr. NORRIS. To the first Monday in the following January.

Mr. ROBINSON. To the first Monday in January. That is correct. So that the interim of time when the result of the election may reflect itself in the action of Congress shall be shortened, and Senators and Representatives elected in the November election shall begin their duties the first Monday in January instead of subsequent to the 4th of March. Under the Constitution as it now exists, unless a special session of the Congress shall be called by the President, a Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate who is elected in November does not actually assume the performance of his duties until the first Monday in December of the following year. Members who have been defeated may continue to perform their functions until the 4th of March of the year following their defeat in November.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; the Senator has stated the condition with absolute correctness.

Now, Mr. President, let me proceed from the point where the Senator from Arkansas interrupted me in order that I may show just exactly what would be the result of the passage of the joint resolution. I have read section 2. Section 3 would also remain, reading as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Then a part of section 4 would remain. If Senators who are following me will turn to page 4, line 3, of the joint resolution, commencing after the period in that line and reading the remainder of the section, they will find that what still remains would read as follows:

The terms of Senators and Representatives who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall end at noon on the first Monday in January of the year in which such terms would otherwise have ended on the fourth day of March.

If the changes which I have suggested were made, that would be all which would remain of the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator from Nebraska know of any opposition to that proposition?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that I really can not conceive of any opposition to it; I should be heartily in favor of it; and am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that it may be passed during the morning hour by unanimous consent. I am inclined to think the Senator ought to be able to secure that result. Of course, I would not be in favor of displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. If it be true, I will say to the Senator, that we could pass the joint resolution during the morning hour, it would not take any longer after the morning hour; and if the Senator would defer his opposition to it, I certainly would be glad to have a vote upon the proposition at any time, as soon as it may be obtained; but I do not mean when I suggest that the Senator withdraw his opposition that the Senator is opposed to the joint resolution. I mean that he would probably be opposed to the motion I have made displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am opposed to, but I should like to see the Senator ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered during the morning hour and ascertain whether there would be any objection to the request.

Mr. NORRIS. I should have followed that course if I had thought it would be possible to get the joint resolution through in that way, but I have never known a proposition for the submission of an amendment to the Constitution to go through in that way. I do not believe I could get it through in that way, although I should be glad to do so if I could. However, no one made such a suggestion, and, in fact, it never occurred to me that it would be possible to have the joint resolution passed during the morning hour.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Nebraska has recently read section 3 of his joint resolution, which provides that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and that its meeting shall be on the first Monday in January following. The effect and purpose of that provision, as I understand, is more promptly and more effectively to reflect in the action of Congress the result of the election?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; that is the purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the proposed constitutional amendment should be submitted and ratified, the country would not again be confronted with the spectacle which is now presented——

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; that would be an impossibility.

Mr. ROBINSON. Namely, pressure from the administration in power to secure—I will not say coerce—the passage of a measure which has been disclosed to be unpopular among the voters of the Nation in an election held prior to the time that measure was taken up for consideration in the Senate of the United States. It has been called to the attention of the Senate and of the country that a great many Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol and some Senators who have committed themselves to what we have come to know as the ship subsidy bill were defeated in the last election, and their successors in many instances are opposed to the passage of that measure. I think it is quite generally admitted that if consideration of the ship subsidy bill be postponed until the new Congress meets, the Congress elected in the November election in 1922, the bill sponsored and advocated so ably by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] would not be passed. For that reason, the President, conscientiously convinced that the public interest requires the enactment of the provisions of the ship subsidy bill or some similar provisions, is apparently exerting every influence he possesses to secure the final disposition of the pending bill.

I stated in the beginning of this debate that the measure should be fully considered by the Senate; that it was not my intention to pursue a course which would prevent the Senate from registering its conclusions respecting the subject after it had become fully familiar with the purposes and provisions of the pending bill. There is in committee amendments proposed to the ship subsidy bill incorporated a policy the effect of which, if enacted into law during the present Congress, will be to deny to subsequent Congresses the opportunity of enacting into law the will of the American people respecting the subject matter of this legislation.

It is proposed now permanently to appropriate out of the Treasury of the United States every dollar of a fund which has not yet been created, the amount of which fund is not yet known and can not as yet be determined. The only purpose that can be in the mind of Senators proposing the provision to which I have referred is to take advantage of the majority that now exists, or is thought to exist, in favor of the proposed legislation, but which will not exist when the viewpoint of the American people as expressed in the last November election is given effect in the Congress of the United States.

Senators who have been defeated, in part because of their support of this measure, and Representatives whose advocacy of it has occasioned their defeat, are asked, in defiance of the will of those who gave them their power here, to impose the burdens of the ship subsidy bill on the Treasury and the people of the United States for a period of 15 years; so that in good faith, however futile may prove the provisions of the bill to accomplish its purposes, however detrimental experience may show them to be to the general public interest, the Congress and the country will be irrevocably committed to the expenditure of the very large sums contemplated by the bill in the nature of a ship subsidy.

For my part, I think the issue of the ship subsidy bill can be simplified. Assuming no authority to speak for any other Senator, but speaking for myself alone, if the Senate committee is willing to recede from the amendments to the bill which seek to fasten upon the country for 15 years the obligations of the bill without regard to the political sentiment of the Nation, I know of no reason why a vote may not be had during the present session of the Congress.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not the floor. The Senator from Nebraska has been good enough to yield to me, and I apologize now to the Senator from Nebraska for taking so much of his time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, if the Senator from Washington or other Senators object to my continuing my remarks now, I shall be compelled to take the floor in my own time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was not going to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If permitted to continue, the time of the Senate will be conserved. I shall conclude my remarks in a few minutes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was not going to object. I was just going to express the hope, however, that when the Senator gets through, the Senator from Nebraska will not yield too often for speeches. I have not been disposed to appeal to the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, it is entirely in the power of the Senator from Washington or any other Senator to prevent interruptions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know it; but I am not going to appeal to the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that if anyone wanted to enforce the rule, I could not permit it to go on without losing the floor. I do not want to lose the floor; but, while the Senator from Arkansas is using my time, I think he is making an argument that applies directly to the question that I am trying to bring before the Senate. I think myself that it is a very appropriate and a very weighty argument that he is making.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that the Senator from Washington has raised any objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. And, with the indulgence of the Senator from Nebraska, I will continue for a few minutes and conclude now what I have in mind to say upon this subject.

This Congress, if it pursues the normal course, may perhaps with propriety legislate and bind the Government for a period of one year. Under the circumstances that exist I think it is objectionable to a degree almost reprehensible to insist, because there is a majority here now, some of whom have been discredited, and because there will not be a majority hereafter in favor of this bill, that the legislation should be passed in spite of the overwhelming sentiment disclosed among the people of the country in opposition to the legislation. For my part, if the application of this bill is limited with due respect to the right and privilege of future Congresses to legislate upon the subject without being confronted with the question of the abrogation of contracts, I have no objection to the Senate taking such course as it deems proper with reference to the matter, and have no objection to a vote on the bill.

Mr. President, I meet the proposal of the President of the United States, contained in his message to Congress delivered a few days ago, that the Senate ought to take a vote upon this proposition, with a counterproposition, so far as my individual attitude is concerned, and that is: All right; abandon the attempt to enact into law now, with the support of Senators and Representatives who have been defeated because of their advocacy of this measure, a bill that will impose upon the country burdens which can not be avoided during the period of 15 years; legislate according to the ordinary practice of the Congress; pursue the policy adopted by the overwhelming vote of the House of Representatives; restore to the bill the provision that the sums hereafter to accrue to the merchant-marine fund must be annually appropriated, and, I think, in view of the conditions that have been disclosed, limit the power to make contracts so that future Congresses may have full and free opportunity to reflect the will of the people concerning the subject, and I see no reason why a vote may not be had upon the bill.

The joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is of great importance. It meets a demand that has been growing throughout the United States that discredited and defeated Congressmen and Senators shall not be permitted to register their support in favor of measures which their constituencies have impliedly disapproved. The joint resolution will give effect to the result of national elections. If adopted as proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, it will put Senators and Congressmen into office a few weeks after their election and it will bring Congress into session within a very short time following the election.

I am not unmindful of what was originally said when the Constitution was adopted and what has recently been said by some public men touching this subject; but it must appear anomalous to students of the question that when a great issue is fought out before the American people and public sentiment is expressed in the election respecting that issue, under the conditions as they now exist the Congress may, as in the instance of the ship subsidy bill now under consideration, impose, in violation of the wishes and the will of the people of this country, obligations and burdens which the public neither approves nor has expressed willingness to assume.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. With the indulgence of the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me at this point—and I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to it—there seems to be some impression over the country that this joint resolution contemplates the election of the President by direct vote of the people.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I will say to the Senator that that is not correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that that is the case at all.

Mr. NORRIS. No. The Senator from Florida probably was not here when I began my remarks. I explained that I had agreed that as far as I was concerned, if Senators would take up this joint resolution, I would divide it into its two component parts and would only ask for the passage at this time of the one relative to the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I see. I wanted, however, to have that cleared up a little, because I have here an editorial from a very excellent newspaper in Florida that seems to be under that impression.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true of the resolution as it stands, of course. If we get it up, I expect to modify it in accordance with the outline I have already given.

Mr. FLETCHER. This editorial lays down the broad proposition that—> if the election of the President be conceded to a majority of the total number of popular votes in these United States, State lines will be wiped out and the voters in the larger States, particularly New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Indiana, and Ohio, will determine every presidential election.

Mr. NORRIS. The writer of that editorial had a misconception even of the proposed amendment. It would not do anything of the kind. The amendment retains the State unit just as it is now.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is what I said.

Mr. NORRIS. The only difference would be, if that part of the amendment were put into the Constitution, that there would be no such thing as electing a lot of presidential electors. The State would have the same number of votes that it has now in the Electoral College——

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. But they would certify those votes up here, instead of sending a lot of unnecessary men up here to cast them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. It is not, however, the same as a direct popular vote for the officers.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, in the sense that the people would have a chance, then, to vote directly for President and Vice President, it is popular voting.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But some unit, of course, it is conceded, must be maintained; and in order to make as little change as possible in the Constitution, I have retained in this amendment the State unit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought there was a distinction there, and I should like to have that cleared up. That is the reason why I mentioned this. Then, as I understand, the Senator proposes to deal particularly with what the Senator from Arkansas is discussing now—the time of going into office and election of Members of the House and Senate, and so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. That is all that would be left in it when the modification is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, respecting that portion of the Senate joint resolution as printed to which the Senator from Florida has referred, I do not desire at this time to express an opinion, further than to say that I think it is essential and necessary, if the manner of electing Presidents be changed, that the unit shall continue to be the State. It should be the State rather than the total vote of the Nation. There are many reasons which I could cite in justification of that suggestion, but I desire to confine my remarks to what I understand will be the question immediately under consideration if the motion of the Senator from Nebraska prevails. namely, changes in the Constitution so as to bring into office on the first Monday in January following their election Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States; further, to move forward the annual sessions of Congress so that the public may be assured, after having considered and determined issues of interest to them, that such issues will be dealt with by Senators and Representatives who are in a position to reflect the viewpoint of their constituencies.

There can be no escape from the declaration that one of the considerations which impelled the advocates of the pending bill to insist upon its determination during the present Congress is to secure the support for the measure of Senators and Representatives who have been defeated in part because of their attitude in favor of this legislation. I shall not attempt to characterize a motive which would prompt the exertion of influence approaching coercion for the passage of legislation known or generally regarded to be violative of the general public will. I shall content myself with saying that the Congress of the United States should not lend its processes to the enactment of legislation and the imposition of burdens upon the Treasury, when the evidence reasonably discloses that such legislation and such burdens meet with disapproval upon the part of the general public.

I have taken the liberty, with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, to bring to the attention of the Senate these considerations at the present time, because they seem to have forceful relationship to the provisions of the pending bill. But the importance of the constitutional amendment now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska can not be determined or limited by its relationship to a single measure. It involves a question of national policy and issues of very great importance. It is a response to the inquiry whether the Congress of the United States, often justly or unjustly criticized as slow to respond to public sentiment, is unwilling to accept the public decisions of questions on which the public have a right to pass, and it answers that question, in my judgment, in a manner consistent with the highest standards of public duty which Senators and Representatives can establish. It solves the problem reasonably and fairly. It does not contemplate the enactment of legislation responsive to passion or vindictiveness, but it seeks to remedy what the press of the Nation, what students of political science, what Senators themselves have come to regard as quite objectionable under the prevailing system.

If it is desirable that the impulse and the impetuous demand for reform sometimes reflected in elections shall not be too promptly responded to, it is of even greater importance that when a question has been made an issue in a political campaign, when the voters have registered their decision and judgment affecting it, those who have been discredited and defeated shall not be permitted to defy the power which exalted them and override the will of the constituency by whose favor they enjoy public office.

I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a few observations right at this point?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection. I can make my remarks later, and if Senators want to debate I will yield the floor and finish my remarks after they are through.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I served five terms in the House of Representatives and have been a Member of this body for six years. I returned four times to Washington to take my seat in the House of Representatives for the short sessions of Congress, a reelected Representative, and I have been here twice in the short sessions when Senators were retiring. Frankly, it never occurred to me in those days that any Member of the House or the Senate who had failed of reelection should be debarred from his right to act upon questions under consideration. He had been elected by his people, and I always assumed, in my thought on the subject, that he would represent the sentiment of his people. In fact, I never gave little thought to it.

When I returned to the Capitol, however, on the first Monday of December last, a defeated Senator, then it did seem, when the thing was applied to me, when the acid test was put on, that after all it was a very great mistake to bring back defeated Senators and Representatives to pass upon questions which had been voted upon by the people in the very recent past. So for the first time in 16 years' service it was brought home to me. I repeat that in the six years of my service in the Senate, when Senators returned after having been defeated, it never occurred to me to question their right to pass upon matters before us here in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have always abstained, in arguing this question, from raising any question about those who had been defeated. Of course, technically they have the same rights as others. The Senator from New York is taking a very high moral ground in this matter, and it does him great credit and great honor to talk as he does. I presume he feels as I have thought I would feel, just a little bit embarrassed in acting on questions, particularly something which had been submitted to the people in a recent election. I should think that Senators and Representatives would often feel that way.

Mr. CALDER. As I have indicated, Mr. President, I have been embarrassed. I came back with great misgivings, and for that reason, when this constitutional amendment was introduced and was discussed in the Senate, I made up my mind that if the opportunity came to me to vote to advance the day when a new Congress should meet, I should gladly do so.

I shall not vote for the Senator's motion to lay aside the subsidy bill. I want the Senate to take a little longer time to its consideration to see if we can pass this measure which, I believe, will be most helpful to America's foreign trade.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CALDER. Just let me conclude what I wanted to say. I made a speech on the subsidy bill about three weeks ago. I had prepared this speech several weeks before, and I had some misgivings about making it. I said to myself, Shall I address the Senate at all in this short session? Shall I express my views here, or shall I, as a Senator from New York, representing that State under the Constitution—the greatest State in population and wealth, entitled to the votes of its two Senators—just occupy my seat and vote on these matters as I believed my people would have me vote, or shall I also take part in the discussion?

I argued with myself, and finally I concluded that the subsidy was a subject which had no part in the campaign in my State. It was never discussed. I venture the statement that if my successful opponent were asked, he would say that he never mentioned it. Frankly, I never mentioned it. I am quite confident that if we could have drawn the line on the issue of Government aid to American shipping, and if that had been the sole issue, I would be sworn in again for another six years when the new Congress meets in December. But it was not.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] might have discussed with me the question of the tariff, the soldiers' bonus, prohibition—all those questions were issues, along with my vote on the Esch-Cummins bill, and all of those things contributed to the result in New York—but with regard to the ship subsidy bill, I will say to my friend from Arkansas, who I am quite certain was not talking to me alone, that I agree that his contention is absolutely sound, that we ought to have the new Congress meet immediately after the election, that the new Members should come in and take their places here, and that the defeated Members should not vote upon questions which were passed upon adversely, as far as they were concerned, by the people.

That is all I wanted to say. I desire to go on record that I am strongly for this resolution, and hope an opportunity may come to me to vote for it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] I agree that the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has taken a very high ground respecting the subject. I have not suggested that any Senator or Representative who has been defeated should be denied his constitutional privilege to participate in the discussion and the decision of questions that arise here. My colleague, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], on November 22, 1922, introduced a concurrent resolution which seemed to have been the original movement in Congress on this important subject. I ask that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

Whereas this is a representative Government speaking for and interpreting the will of the people of the United States as expressed at the polls; and

Whereas no Representative in either branch of Congress has the moral right to support or vote for any measure which the people by their votes have repudiated; and

Whereas certain proposed legislation affecting a fundamental change in our economic and commercial policy is now recommended by the Executive for consideration by Congress; and

Whereas this proposed legislation has failed to receive the approval of the voters as evidenced by the elections recently held; and

Whereas Congress has been called into extraordinary session for the purpose of passing this legislation which the people have by imperative and unmistakable mandate repudiated; and

Whereas a Congress which adopts legislation in defiance of a popular mandate to the contrary would perpetrate an act of usurpation; and

Whereas many advocates of the ship subsidy bill in the present Congress have been rejected by emphatic majorities by their constituents; and

Whereas it is unwise to place in the hands of rejected public servants the power to adopt fundamental legislation; and

Whereas a sense of official propriety would suggest to the defeated Members the unwisdom of participating in legislation which, if enacted, would materially affect fundamental questions of public policy: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., I. That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that all Members defeated at the recent polls abstain from voting on any but routine legislation, such as necessary supply bills, motions to adjourn, or motions to recess, and such other legislation as does not involve any material change of national policy.

II. That chairmen of committees, not in sympathy with the people's wishes as expressed at the polls, and which have an important effect on legislation, resign from their respective chairmanships, so that their places may be filled by those who are known to be willing to carry into legislative effect the mandate of the people as expressed at the polls on the 7th day of November, 1922.

III. That the Senate of the United States reaffirm their readiness to bow to the people's will, when expressed at the polls, and declare that the vote of want of confidence in the leaders which has been registered shall not be disregarded.

Mr. ROBINSON. The purpose of the concurrent resolution was to express the sense of the Senate that Senators and Representatives who have been defeated should not vote on important issues here pending the time when their successors shall take their places. While it appears that the end sought by the concurrent resolution introduced by my colleague is not to be accomplished in the way that he sought to accomplish it, I have not the slightest doubt that when the subject is fully considered by the Congress and when the American people know that it is to be determined here the principle underlying the concurrent resolution offered by the junior Senator from Arkansas on November 22, 1922, and the provisions of the joint resolution now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will be incorporated into the law of the land. The Constitution ought to be so amended that Senators and Representatives after they have experienced defeat will not be compelled to experience the humiliation of passing upon questions, when they know that their opinions respecting those questions do not reflect the viewpoint of their constituents.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on the 12th of April, 1921, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution No. 8, to amend the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President of the United States shall commence on the third Monday in January following the election of presidential and vice presidential electors.

"SEC. 2. The presidential and vice presidential electors, composing the Electoral College, shall assemble in the States by which they are appointed and cast their votes for President and Vice President on the second Monday in December following their appointment, and the vote so cast, duly certified, shall be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January next thereafter, and the Congress shall meet in joint session on the second Monday in January following and open and count the same: Provided, That Congress may alter all the dates fixed in this section, in its discretion.

"SEC. 3. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

"SEC. 4. There shall be held two regular sessions of Congress, convening on the first Monday of January each year.

"SEC. 5. This amendment shall not take effect until after the 4th day of March of the year 1925."

The Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate appointed a subcommittee to hear arguments. The American Bar Association sent a representative, a learned and distinguished lawyer, Mr. William L. Putnam, of the Boston bar. He argued in support of the principle of the resolution.

There also appeared before the committee Mr. Levi Cook, of the District of Columbia bar, and Mr. Edgar Wallace, legislative representative of the American Federation of Labor. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD at this point the statements of Mr. Cook and Mr. Wallace made before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. LEVI COOKE, MEMBER OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CHANGE OF DATE OF PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATION, AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. COOKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have but little to add to Mr. Putnam's statement. The American Bar Association is committed to this change. The lawyers in their association meetings have studied this matter, and it is their conviction, after a consideration extending over a period of several years, that such a change should be made.

From my own observations I feel that the people of the country do not understand the short session of Congress following the general election. That session of Congress has got the reputation for a period of years of doing very little except to pass the supply bills, not concerning itself with great questions of policy that the country may be interested in, for the most part because of the inability of the Congress during that short time to give the necessary attention to such subjects.

I think the Congress itself will be far more efficient with two long sessions in the course of a two-year term, each beginning on the 1st of January.

As Mr. Putnam has stated, the beginning of the presidential term and the coming in of the Congress on March 4 is in a way an historical accident and has now become a dangerous anachronism.

I think while it may have applied accidentally to the Congress in the earlier days, in the first days of the Government under this Constitution, yet the necessities of the times in those days commended the dates to the people. Travel was difficult. There was not an automobile or an airplane; in fact, we had no railroad trains or steamboats in those days, and there was not a Burroughs adding machine to count the election returns. Men in remote parts of the country had to send in their two or three ballots by horseback, over long distances, so that their votes might be counted. I know that in the lifetime of my own father it was two months after the election of President before they knew the result in the country at large, particularly in southern Ohio, I mean; and they did not know who were the Members of the new Congress until a much later time than that.

The times have completely changed. What was an accident in the beginning, and thereafter a necessity, has long since ceased to be useful in this country, and has led us now in the year 1922 to a point where the public at large does not understand why the Congress functions in the way it does after election.

Furthermore, we have had the experience in the past decade of almost regular extraordinary sessions of Congress to fill the gaps and make the Congress function as it should function.

The more important acts of Congress are usually passed in September or October after a long session extending throughout the summer, commencing in March, or perhaps called by the President in April. That can be avoided by this system. Congress can function promptly after January 1 and dispatch its business, and, in addition, there can be some relaxation for the Members of the House and Senate, which will not only benefit them individually but give them some more vacation than they have had and some more opportunity to return to their homes and mix with their people.

The point that Senator ASHURST mentioned as being one objection has been studied by some of the persons who have given thought to the subject; that is, under the present system, cumbersome as it can be, there is a cooling-out period between the excitement of the campaign and election and the actual holding of a session. That is an argument that is without foundation in fact, a criticism that certainly can not be substantiated. If five months is a good cooling-out period, maybe five years would be better. We would then have gentlemen coming here so well cooled out that the topics discussed on the hustings would no longer be fresh in their minds and they would probably be heating up on something else.

Senator ASHURST. If that be true, perhaps a jury should be allowed a cooling period after hearing evidence in a criminal case.

Mr. COOKE. Yes; they might be sent home for a year to cool off.

While we can not, perhaps, be guided by English customs and precedents for this country, it is none the less fair to take their experience as illuminating. They have no objection to going into a general election and then bringing their members to Westminster without any delay. And they have their bitter contests as well as we. They have just had an election, which was very warmly contested, indeed. I think they have never had any difficulty by way of any radical action because of the immediate meeting of a new Parliament.

Certainly we can trust the mass of our citizenry to send men to Senate and House who will be prepared to do their duty the day after election as well as five months after election.

If the American people take this amendment and ratify it, they will themselves be getting what they want in the way of prompt dispatch of public business by the Congress.

Without any criticism of the operations of the Congress over a period of years, I feel that it is fair to say, and that the statement would be fully understood, that the short session of the Congress is not a good institution. It has been a source of great criticism and it ought to be abandoned. We ought to have each of the two sessions of the Congress equally dignified, equally able to dispatch public business in a deliberate and fair fashion, in the way it should be dispatched. As matters stand now we are driven to the substitute of extra sessions of Congress to patch out, and we are practically losing one year.

It is not necessary to comment on the attitude of any individual Member of House or Senate who may find himself in the short session a Member of Congress defeated at the polls. It is possible that some men, finding themselves in the Congress in that position, are at least indifferent.

There is but one other thing I have to add, but because I live in the District of Columbia I have had my attention drawn to it particularly. There has been discussion from time to time in the city of Washington as to the propriety of changing the date of the inauguration on account of the inclemency of the weather on March 4 for a period of many years. I do not think that should concern the Congress at all in submitting this amendment. Slush on the streets in Washington one day in four years certainly ought not to affect public business forever. I think that idea should be discarded completely as having no bearing upon this great and fundamental question of the legislative system for the Nation.

If it should be decided to inaugurate the President in January, I think they would find just as crisp and sparkling weather in Washington as in May. At any rate, it is not a matter of any great importance. The great and vital thing is that the people of the country would welcome and hurriedly indorse a change in the system which would allow their balloting at the polls promptly to be recorded in the presence of the men they elect in Congress.

I will add, Senator BRANDEGEE, on the date of making the amendment effective, this statement: Of course, when the eighteenth amendment was submitted it was provided that it should become operative one year after ratification by three-fourths of the States. I do not question that when the committee comes to deal with the precise point in this proposed amendment a similar provision to that incorporated in the eighteenth amendment might be employed which would accomplish precisely the purpose the committee would wish the resolution to have.

And I might add that the Supreme Court of the United States scanned that provision with great care and decided it was strictly proper. And, as Senator PEPPER says, it becomes a part of the Constitution and is effective as such, but speaking intrinsically in its own terms it becomes operative at a date so provided.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator PEPPER, are you interested in this question and will you give us the benefit of your views?

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the subcommittee, I am interested in this question, but everything I had to say has been better said by those who preceded me. Mr. Cooke, I think, has summed the case up admirably, and I will not attempt to spoil the case by adding anything to what he has said.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone else wish to be heard?

STATEMENT OF MR. EDGAR WALLACE, LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say that the executive council has taken cognizance of this resolution and favor the principles of it. We recognize that there may be some difference of opinion as to the language, but we are confident that you gentlemen can fix that to the best advantage.

We favor the principle because we believe immediate steps ought to be taken to make the change that seems to be the unanimous wish of everyone I have spoken to, in all walks of life.

Probably at the time the Constitution was written it was necessary to allow the long time to elapse between election and actual entry upon the duties of the office, as provided in the Constitution. That was the time of the stage coach, and when it was only possible to transmit ideas by word of mouth or by handwriting. It was a slow and laborious method of doing business, and it was necessary, no doubt, to have a considerable time elapse.

But that day and generation has passed. It is the opinion of the American Federation of Labor that immediate steps ought to be taken to submit this very desirable amendment to the States.

I believe that is about all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone else desire to be heard? [After a pause.] If not, the hearing will be considered as closed and the subcommittee will adjourn.

MEMORANDUM IN REGARD TO A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT SHORTENING THE TIME WHICH ELAPSES BETWEEN THE ELECTION AND THE INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND ABOLISHING THE SHORT SESSION OF THE OLD CONGRESS, PREPARED FOR SUBMISSION TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE SENATE.

The American Bar Association is a conservative body whose members love and reverence the Constitution and are reluctant to change it.

They were led to consider this change because the present Constitution seemed to them to contain a weakness and a source of danger which might not be generally obvious, and that it was the duty of the association as lawyers to call this danger to the attention of the President and Congress in order that it might be dealt with calmly and in a nonpartisan spirit by the friends of the Constitution.

It seems better to us to have the Constitution amended carefully by skillful hands rather than to run the risk of its being found wanting at some critical time and subjected to unfriendly attack and perhaps mutilation. In 1917, therefore, the bar association appointed a special committee to consider this question. During the war the committee was not very active, but in 1919 and 1920 they reported favorably to the change and their reports were approved by the association. In 1921 at the request of the committee the association passed the following resolution:

"Whereas the association at its last meeting passed a resolution favoring such action as would lead to the dates of the election and of the inauguration of the President of the United States being brought nearer together and to the abandonment of the short session of the old Congress; and

"Whereas it is deemed desirable to express further the sense of this association that as far as practicable there should be the shortest possible interval between the mandate of power and the assumption of responsibility thereunder: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That it is desirable—

"1. That Congress should come into being immediately upon its election and that the ensuing session of Congress should be a session of the new Congress and not of the old one.

"2. That the electors should meet at the earliest practicable date to cast their votes for President and Vice President.

"3. That the Congress should meet at the earliest practicable date to count the votes for President and Vice President.

"4. That the President and Vice President should be inaugurated thereafter without any unnecessary lapse of time." (Reports of American Bar Association, Vol. XLVI, 1921, p. 76.)

It is reasonably clear that the framers of the Constitution intended the new Congress and not the old one to assemble in December after they were elected. Throughout the debate on this particular clause of the Constitution which will be found in II Farrand's Constitutional Convention, pages 194 to 200, this intention is shown. For example, a suggestion was made that May instead of December should be the date of the assembling of Congress in order that the latest advices from Europe might be at hand, but this suggestion was defeated on the argument of Mr. Randolph that "the time—the States' elections—with which the elections of the national Representatives would no doubt be made to coincide, would suit better with December than May." (II Farrand, p. 200.) If it had been the old Congress who were to assemble the exact times when they were to be elected would have been immaterial. The fact that December was chosen as the date for the convening of Congress because the time suited better with the time of the election shows not only that it was intended that it should be the new Congress which assembled in December but that the framers believed in having the new Congress assemble reasonably soon after it was elected.

The date on which the new Constitution should go into effect was not fixed by the Constitutional Convention because it was dependent on the action of the States in ratifying the Constitution. The date was fixed by the old Continental Congress, and they fixed the first Wednesday in March, 1789, which happened to be the 4th of March, as the time for commencing proceedings under the new Constitution. (Journal of Congress, vol. 13, p. 141, and also H. R. 121, p. 5, 61st Cong., 2d sess.)

A quorum of Congress was not present on March 4 and did not arrive until April 6, 1789, on which date the votes were counted by the new Congress and Washington and Adams were declared elected President and Vice President, respectively, and Washington was inaugurated President on April 30, 1789. Toward the close of Washington's first administration Congress passed an act declaring (sec. 12) "that the term of four years for which a President and Vice President shall be elected shall in all cases commence on the 4th day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the electors shall have been given." (Act of March 1, 1798, I Stat. L. p. 239 et seq.)

As Washington and Adams took their oaths of office on April 30, 1789, this act shortened their terms by nearly two months. The act, however, was never called in question.

In this curious way it came about that in the case of the first election of Washington it was the newly elected Congress which counted the votes but that thereafter it was always the old Congress which counted the votes for President.

This was brought about by shortening the terms of Washington and Adams without correspondingly shortening the terms of the Congressmen elected during the same year.

All the committees of the bar association who have considered this matter have been of the opinion that it would not be wise to try to shorten the terms of the President, Vice President, or Congressmen without a constitutional amendment. The constitutional amendment is, however, of an administrative character and would operate only on the terms of one President and Vice President and one set of Congressmen. The reasons which have led us to recommend this change are in general the same which would lead any business man or manufacturing corporation which had decided to change its general manager to make the change as promptly as possible. People holding office who know they have lost the confidence of their employer or constituents have necessarily lost a great part of their usefulness.

Now that the United States has come into close contact with other nations, situations frequently arise which require prompt and firm handling so that the danger from the present situation is becoming very great.

We firmly believe that if President Lincoln had been inaugurated in January instead of March the Civil War might have been avoided. Lincoln's kind and sagacious diplomacy and his trustworthy character would probably have so soothed the Virginia legislators that that State would never have seceded and that there would have been no war. With this terrible example in our history of the dangerous hazards that may attend the present interval between the election and the inauguration of the President, we feel that steps should be immediately taken to remedy the defect.

WILLIAM L. PUTNAM.
LEVI COOKE.

(Whereupon at 11 o'clock and 25 minutes a. m. the subcommittee adjourned.)

Mr. ASHURST. I would also include the illuminating paper and able speech of Mr. Putnam, of the Boston bar, but his statement and speech was so broken by interruptions that I do not feel justified in taking so much of the space of the RECORD.

Mr. President, the Constitution, Article II, section 1, ordains that the President and Vice President shall hold office for the term of four years, but does not provide when the terms shall commence. The only recognition of the 4th of March succeeding the day of a presidential election as the day of the commencement of the terms of the President and Vice President is the provision in the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, effective September 25, 1804, that—if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the 4th day of March next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

This would probably be construed to be a provision that the term of the President expired on the 4th of March after a presidential election—that a vacancy then exists—in which event the then Vice President succeeded to the office.

The time when the presidential electors should be elected, and the date on which they shall meet and give their vote is, by Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, left to the discretion of Congress, with the restriction that the day of voting shall be the same throughout the United States. An act was passed February 3, 1887, requiring them to meet and give their vote on the second Monday in January next after their appointment, in such place in each State as the legislature thereof shall direct; which vote, duly certified, to be delivered to the President of the Senate before the first Wednesday in February, and be canvassed by Congress, in joint session, on the second Wednesday in February thereafter.

The Constitution, while providing that Representatives shall hold their offices for two years (Art. I, sec. 2) and Senators for six years (Art. I, sec. 3), does not provide when the terms shall commence.

The commencement of the terms of the first President and Vice President, and of the Senators and Representatives composing the first Congress, was fixed by a resolution of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, providing "that the first Wednesday in March next—which happened to be the 4th day of March—be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution."

Congress has provided (act of Mar. 1, 1792, Rev. Stat., sec. 152) that the terms of the President and Vice President shall commerce on the 4th day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the electors have been given, but there seems to be no statutes enacted since the adoption of the Constitution fixing the commencement of the terms of Senators and Representatives.

The Constitution is proposed to be amended by the resolution as follows:

1. The terms of the President and Vice President, by the first section, are made to commence on the third Monday in January instead of the 4th day of March succeeding the election of electors.

The electors are required, by the second section, to meet and cast their vote on the second Monday in December succeeding their appointment; the vote to be filed with the President of the Senate before the first Monday in January thereafter, and the Congress to meet, in joint session, to open and count the same on the second Monday in January succeeding. The Congress, however, is authorized to change these dates.

The provisions of this section are entirely new, the present Constitution having left these matters entirely to the discretion of Congress, and are for the purpose of preventing confusion in putting the first section into effect.

3. The terms of Senators and Representatives are, by a third section, made to commence on the first Monday in January following their election.

This provision is new, and although there is no provision in the present Constitution fixing when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence, yet those providing that their terms shall be six and two years entitle those now in office and hereafter to be elected to hold for two years after the 4th of March succeeding their election, the day when the first Senators and Representatives were qualified under the Constitution, and their terms can not be changed without a constitutional provision.

4. The fourth section merely changes the second paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, in effect, so as to provide that Congress shall meet each year, commencing on the first Monday of January instead of the first Monday in December.

5. The provisions of section 5 are temporary, and for the purpose merely of putting into effect the material provisions by shortening the terms of the President and Vice President, and Senators and Representatives, to the extent of the periods between the dates fixed by the resolution for the commencement of the terms of these officers hereafter, and the 4th of March succeeding said dates.

Under the present law Congress does not convene in regular session until 13 months after the election of its Members. There was some reason for such a provision at the time of the formation of our Government, as it then took a long time to ascertain the results of elections and to reach the Capitol from remote parts of the country. But there is no excuse whatever now, since the most distant States of the Union are within a few days' travel of Washington.

Senators heretofore have been elected by the legislatures of the States in January, and sometimes not until February or March. But since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, by which Senators are to be elected by the people, probably at the November election, it becomes opportune for Congress to convene in January following. The convening of Congress on the first Monday of December, as at present, is inopportune, as adjournment for the Christmas holidays is always taken and many Members go to their homes, returning late, which precludes any real work until January.

The reasons for the adoption of the proposed amendment are these:

First. Congress should at the earliest practicable time enact—within the limits of the Constitution—the principles of the majority of the people, as expressed in the election of each Congress. That is why the Constitution requires the election of a new Congress every two years. If it be not to reflect the sentiment of the people these frequent elections have no meaning nor purpose. Any evasion of this is subversive of the fundamental principle of our Government, that the majority shall rule. No other nation has its legislative body convene so long after the expression of the people upon governmental questions.

During the campaign preceding a congressional election the great questions that divide the political parties are discussed for the purpose of determining the policy of the Government and of having the sentiments of the majority crystalized into legislation. It seems to be trifling with the rights of the people when their mandates can not be obeyed within a reasonable time. It is unfair to an administration that the legislation which it thinks so essential to the prosperity of the country should be so long deferred. It is true an extraordinary session may be called early, but such sessions are limited generally to one or two subjects, which of necessity make for enormous waste of the time of each House, waiting for the other to consider and pass the measures.

Second. As the law is at the present time, the second regular session does not convene until after the election of the succeeding Congress. As an election often changes the political complexion of a Congress, under the present law many times we have the injustice of a Congress that has been disapproved by the people enacting laws for the people opposed to their last expression. Such a condition does violence to the rights of the majority. A Member of the House of Representatives can barely get started in his work until the time arrives for the nominating convention of his district. He has accomplished nothing, and hence has made no record upon which to go before his party or his people. This is an injustice both to the Members and to the people. The record of a Representative should be completed before he asks an indorsement of his course.

Third. Under the present system a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives is seldom, if ever, decided until more than half the term, and in many instances until a period of 22 months of the term has expired. For all that time the occupant of the seat draws the salary, and when his opponent is seated he also draws the salary for the full term; thus the Government pays for the representation from that district twice. But that is not the worst feature of the situation; during all of that time the district is being misrepresented, at least politically, in Congress.

By Congress meeting the first Monday in January succeeding the elections, contested-election cases can be disposed of at least during the first six months of the Congress.

Fourth. The President and Vice President should enter upon the performance of their duties as soon as the new Congress can count the electoral votes. The newly elected governors of the States are inducted into office as soon as the new legislatures of the States canvass the votes and declare their election. It is the old Congress which now counts the electoral votes. It is dangerous to permit the defeated party to retain control of the machinery by which such important officers are declared elected.

In the event that no candidate for President receives a majority of the electoral votes, the Constitution provides that the House of Representatives shall elect the President, each State having one vote. At the present time it is the old Congress that elects the President under such contingency, and thereby it becomes possible for a political party repudiated by the people to elect a President who was defeated at the election. Under the present provision of the Constitution, in the event the House fails to choose a President before the 4th of March, then the Vice President then in office becomes President for four years. This affords a temptation by mere delay to defeat the will of the people, and if it is ever exercised it will likely produce a revolution.

It is true that January weather might be inclement for an inaugural parade, but that is a reason too insignificant to constitute an argument against a constitutional amendment which promises so much for good government. Nearly all the governors of the States are inaugurated in January. The pomp and ceremony which usually attend the coronations of monarchs are at least not necessary to a republic.

But, Mr. President, even greater in importance than advancing the date for the inauguration of President and Vice President is our duty to submit a constitutional amendment so that the people themselves in some manner may have an opportunity to be heard upon the ratification of amendments.

Mr. President, in the Sixty-sixth Congress the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] introduced a proposed amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE V.

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution when ratified within six years from the date of their proposal by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, or by the electors in three-fourths thereof, as the mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

This amendment was reported favorably from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

We have had 19 amendments to the Federal Constitution. I will consider the first 10 amendments as a part and parcel of the original Constitution, because when the Constitution was ratified it was upon the implied, in some cases express, understanding that these Bill of Rights amendments would be adopted. They were proposed and submitted by the First Congress on the 15th of September, 1789. They were 12 in number. The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth were ratified by the required number of States within exactly two years and three months. But No. 1 and No. 2 are still pending, and on the 15th day of next September will have been pending 134 years.

Congress, in submitting the prohibition amendment, laid a limit upon the time within which the States could ratify.

Amendments have been brought about by "amendment epochs." The eleventh and twelfth amendments were adopted in the 10-year period between 1794 and 1804, the twelfth having been brought about by the unfortunate tie in the Electoral College between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. Call that the first amendment epoch. Then, notwithstanding the fact that many scores of amendments were introduced in Congress and two were proposed between 1804 and 1864, no amendment was adopted; thus there was a 60-year period of immobility with respect to amending our Federal Constitution.

Then came the second amendment epoch, which began in 1865 and lasted until 1875. In that 10-year period the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were proposed and adopted.

Then came nearly 40 years of immobility, and then came the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth amendments—the third amendment epoch, 1909 to 1923—showing that these amendments move in cycles.

The Federal Constitution conserves and protects all that real Americans hold precious; it should not be changed by legislative caucus.

There is not a State in the Federal Union whose constitution may be amended by the State legislature. The State of Delaware is an apparent but not a real exception, as Delaware requires that an amendment to the State constitution must be proposed by at least two-thirds of one legislature, then there must be notice to the electors for a certain period before the next election, so that if they desire they can express their will at the polls upon the proposition, then the amendment must be ratified by a second legislature by a two-thirds vote, which gives them an indirect vote. The various State constitutions may be amended only by the electorate of the State. How utterly archaic, therefore, it is to deny the electorate an opportunity to express itself upon the proposed change in our fundamental law.

If the consent of the voters be required to alter and amend a State constitution, a fortiori, the vote of the people should be required to change the Federal Constitution.

It is vital to our American system that the voter should have an opportunity to say at the ballot box under what form of government he desires to live.

If you are not willing that the State legislatures should choose United States Senators, for a much stronger reason the State legislatures should not change your fundamental law.

Every argument in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people is a stronger argument in favor of consulting the people on constitutional amendments.

I favored the amendments providing for the income tax, direct election of Senators, prohibition, and woman suffrage. I believe they were wise amendments, and that they were in response to the deliberate judgment and progressive thought of a vast majority of our countrymen; indeed, I believe those amendments were demanded by the people and were not forced upon the people. My belief, unfortunately, does not settle the question; for the stubborn fact exists that millions of our countrymen thoroughly believe that the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments were adopted by cunning, by craftiness and indirection, and that the Congress and the State legislatures were either browbeaten into voting for the amendments or were induced to do so by an insidious lobby. It is my opinion that if a referendum to the people on the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments could have been had, each amendment would have been adopted and ratified by the electors. We should, therefore, take the requisite steps to preclude in the future a recurrence of such discontent and suspicion by providing a means by which the electors of each State may pass upon amendments to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, there are 435 Members of the House of Representatives and 96 Members of the Senate, in all 531. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a statement showing the number of State senators, number of members of the house or assembly, as the case may be, in the State legislatures.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

Number of members in State legislatures according to the year 1919.

State.	Senate.	House or assembly.
Alabama	35	106
Arizona	19	35
Arkansas	35	100
California	40	80
Colorado	35	60
Connecticut	35	258
Delaware	17	35
Florida	32	75
Georgia	44	189
Idaho	37	65
Illinois	51	152
Indiana	50	100
Iowa	50	108
Kansas	40	125
Kentucky	38	100
Louisiana	41	115
Maine	31	151
Maryland	27	102
Massachusetts	40	240
Michigan	32	100
Minnesota	67	130
Mississippi	49	133
Missouri	34	142
Montana	41	95
Nebraska	33	100
Nevada	17	37
New Hampshire	24	404
New Jersey	21	60
New Mexico	24	49
New York	51	150
North Carolina	50	120
North Dakota	49	113
Ohio	36	128
Oklahoma	44	111
Oregon	30	60
Pennsylvania	50	207
Rhode Island	39	100
South Carolina	44	124
South Dakota	45	103
Tennessee	33	99
Texas	31	142
Utah	18	46
Vermont	30	246
Virginia	40	100
Washington	41	97
West Virginia	30	94
Wisconsin	33	100
Wyoming	27	57
	1,760	5,643

Members of senate	1,760
Members of houses of assembly	5,643
Total	7,403

So we have a total of 7,403 members of the State legislatures, according to the figures for the year 1919—not two-thirds but a bare majority of that 7,400 men—may pass upon an amendment to the Constitution.

We find ourselves in this posture: Two-thirds of the Congress and a majority of the 7,400, or about 4,500 men, pass upon the destiny of the most advanced people that ever lived in the tide of times. We set ourselves up as the leader among the nations in thought and as responsive to the people's will, and yet 4,500 men, if they saw fit, could Prussianize the Republic.

It is startling to investigate and then reflect upon the perils that have come and that in the future may come by a continued failure to set a time limit within which a proposed amendment may be ratified.

Four different amendments duly proposed by the Congress are now pending before the States for their action. These amendments are as follows:

One, proposed September 15, 1789, 134 years ago, relating to enumeration and representation:

ARTICLE I. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Another, proposed September 15, 1789, 134 years ago, relating to compensation of Members of Congress:

ART. II. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Another, proposed May 1, 1810, 113 years ago, to prohibit citizens of the United States from accepting presents, pensions, or titles from princes or from foreign powers:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Another, proposed March 2, 1861, 62 years ago, known as the Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.)

On September 15, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were proposed by the First Congress. The requisite number of States ratified proposed articles numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 within exactly two years and three months, whilst Nos. 1 and 2, although proposed 134 years ago, have not, according to the latest available returns, received favorable action by the requisite number of States and are yet before the American people, or the States, rather, have been for 134 years, and are now subject to ratification or rejection by the States. After those two proposed amendments, to wit, Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubilous—"in the clouds"—for 84 years, the Ohio State Senate in 1873, in response to a tide of indignation that swept over the land in opposition to the so-called "back-salary grab," resurrected proposed amendment No. 2 and passed a resolution of ratification through the State senate. No criticism can be visited upon the Ohio Legislature that attempted to ratify the amendment proposed in 1789, and if the amendment had been freshly proposed by Congress at the time of the "back-salary grab," instead of having been drawn forth from musty tomes, where it had so long lain idle, stale, and dormant, other States doubtless would have ratified it during the period from 1873 to 1881.

Thus it would seem that a period of 134 years, or 84 years, within which a State may act is altogether too long, and I will support a proposition limiting the time to 6, 8, or 10 years within which a State may act under a particular submission, so that we will not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a cloudy, nebulous haze, which a State here may resurrect and ratify, and a State there may galvanize and ratify.

We ought to have homogeneous, steady, united exertion, and certainly we should have contemporaneous action with reference to these various proposed amendments. Judgment on the case should be rendered within the ordinary lifetime of those interested in bringing about the change in our fundamental law. Final action should be had while the discussions and arguments are within the remembrance of those who are called upon to act.

There is still another reason why a time limit should be set: When the 12 amendments were submitted in 1789 there were only 13 States. Vermont had not been admitted, if I remember correctly.

Question: Should three-fourths of the States then in the Union or three-fourths of those now in the Union be the test as to what shall be the number required for ratification?

The amendment proposed on May 1, 1810, was submitted to the States under interesting and peculiar auspices and was as follows:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

What was the reason for that proposed amendment? It is probable that the Congress which submitted the amendment believed that when officials accept presents of great value they dissolve the pearl of independence in the vinegar of obligation.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remark of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country."

What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous, and his marriage to a Maryland lady, may have suggested this measure.

An article in Niles's Register (vol. 72, p. 166), written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles relate to the passage of this amendment through Congress in regard to titles of nobility. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. The Federalists thought the Democratic Party would oppose it as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subserviency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment. "It can do no harm" was what reconciled it to all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Even in those days there were some "four-flushers."

Mr. ASHURST. I recognize the term; I know the nomenclature whence it comes, and "four-flushers" I think there were at that time.

That amendment was submitted 113 years ago, and it was ratified within two years by Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It was rejected by two or three of the States. At one period of our national life the school-book histories and the public men stated that it was a part of our organic law, because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress announcing ratification or promulgate to the public any notice whatever as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there may not be found any notice of any proclamation or promulgation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The States assumed—it was not an unwarranted or violent assumption—that when the requisite number of States had ratified an amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law.

When the War between the States began to throw its shadow over the land, men rushed here and there with a compromise to heal the breach, if possible, and tried to avert the shock that was apparently about to come to our governmental structure.

Expedient after expedient was proposed, and just before the adjournment of Congress—to wit, on March 2, 1861—the following amendment, known as the Corwin amendment, to the Constitution of the United States was proposed to the States, and it read as follows:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.) Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.

That amendment was proposed by Congress on the 2d of March, 1861, and I warrant there are not 5,000 people in the United States to-day who know that such an amendment is now pending before the various States of the Union for their ratification. The amendment was ratified by the State of Ohio and by the State of Maryland through their legislatures and by the State of Illinois in 1862 by a convention.

Thus we perceive that a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may not be voted upon by the State is not fair to posterity nor to the present generation. It keeps historians, publishers, and annalists, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

Having searched closely as to whether there is in the Constitution itself any expressed or implied limitation as to when an amendment may not be adopted, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion that an amendment to the Constitution, once having been duly proposed, although proposed September 15, 1789, could not be recalled even by the unanimous vote of both Houses, if the Congress wished the same recalled, because the power to submit an amendment is specifically pointed out; but no power is given to recall it, and silence is negation.

I am not without authority on this subject, and I shall include in the RECORD some data I have collected on this subject.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ASHURST. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. While the Senator is discussing that subject, does he recall the rather interesting decision of the court that a State that refuses to ratify may afterwards ratify, but a State that has once ratified can not recede?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes. I will discuss that.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, I am only giving my own opinion now; but I am of opinion that a State which rejects a proposed amendment may, of course, at any time thereafter ratify the same, and that a State which adopts or ratifies a proposed amendment may withdraw its ratification, provided it withdraws such ratification before the required number of States shall have ratified. That is to say, if 36 States are necessary to a ratification, and State A ratifies and becomes the thirty-sixth to do so, manifestly it can not thereafter withdraw its ratification; but if the 36 States were necessary, and State A were the thirty-fifth or the twentieth State to ratify, it could withdraw that ratification when its withdrawal would not be determinative of the result.

As a little thumb-nail sketch, as a vignette of many things that took place with reference to the fifteenth amendment, let me read now from a statement that was read to the Committee on the Judiciary by Mr. Caperton Braxton, of Staunton, Va. I can not read it all; it would be too long; but it is an interesting paper, and Senators will find their time well repaid to read it all.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—AN ACCOUNT OF ITS ENACTMENT.

[By A. Caperton Braxton, of Staunton, Va.]

"If the passage of this amendment through Congress was unseemly, its ratification by the State legislature was, in several instances, at least, nothing short of scandalous.

"The amendment passed the Senate rather late Friday night, February 26, 1869. The next morning, as soon as the enrolled resolution was signed by the Presiding Officer, it was telegraphed by Congressman Sydney Clarke to the Legislature of Kansas, then on the point of adjournment. His telegram, entirely unofficial, was received by the legislature during its afternoon session, and that very evening, in less than 24 hours after the amendment had passed Congress, long before it had been certified to the States for action, and before anyone in Kansas had even seen it (other than Clarke's telegraphic copy), the legislature of that State ratified it. The people of Kansas, at the polls about a year previous, had voted against negro suffrage by a majority of 2 to 1.

"Senator Stewart, of Nevada, was, if anything, more anxious than Congressman Clarke, of Kansas, to obtain action by existing legislatures before the people could make themselves heard. The State of Nevada had very recently adopted a constitution which restricted suffrage to 'white' men. The people of that State, like those of California and Oregon, were overwhelmingly opposed to an extension of the elective franchise to any but white men—not so much for fear of the negro as of the Chinese vote. It was generally conceded among the radical press that Nevada would certainly reject the amendment, but they underrated the resources of their own generals. Late Friday night, as soon as the Presiding Officer had announced that 39 votes was two-thirds of a Senate of 66 Members, Senator Stewart, impressed with the fact just stated by him to the Senate that the legislatures were waiting to ratify the amendment, and that if it was not done by them, and at once, the whole thing would be lost, caused the Secretary of the Senate, without even waiting for the resolution to be enrolled or signed, to telegraph it to the Legislatures of Nevada and Louisiana, to which telegrams he and three others added a message urging the immediate ratification by the legislatures.

"This remarkable dispatch did not reach Nevada till the next morning, Saturday, when the legislature at once endeavored to comply with its instructions, but they were not quite so docile as in Kansas, and did not succeed until Monday morning, March 1, 1869, when they ratified the amendment against a strong written protest of the minority, including Republicans and Democrats. This protest insisted, among other things, that the amendment had not received the constitutional two-thirds majority in the Federal Senate; that the Legislature of Nevada had as yet no official knowledge of the proposed amendment (the telegraphic report of it being, as it afterwards transpired, materially incorrect); that the people of Nevada should be given an opportunity to be heard upon it, and that the people, by voting the Republican ticket for President, had just within a few months past ratified the declaration of the Republican platform of May, 1868, that the control by loyal States of their suffrage laws should not be interfered with. But all this was as baying at the moon, and Nevada was recorded as the second State ratifying the fifteenth amendment.

"The records of the Legislature of Missouri fail to show how that body was informed of the passage of the fifteenth amendment in Congress; the newspapers of the day said some one heard of it by telegram. This was enough; accordingly, that legislature, early Monday morning, March 1, 1869, suspended their rules and ratified what they thought was the amendment, but it turned out, after they had adjourned, that the thing they ratified was not the amendment at all and so they had to ratify all over again when they next assembled.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will put that in the RECORD. It is in our hearings.

Mr. ASHURST. It is so long that I hesitate to include the entire article in the RECORD. It is, as I say, from a statement made by Mr. Caperton Braxton, of Staunton, Va., respecting the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, is the Senator going to discuss also the fact that some of the States that ratified the fifteenth amendment were required to do so before they were permitted to be States?

Mr. ASHURST. I am not so familiar with that as the Senator probably is, and I had not intended to discuss it.

Mr. CARAWAY. A State, being declared out of the Union, was told that it could get back only by ratifying the amendment, which it had to do as a State when it was not a State.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is interesting in this connection.

Mr. ASHURST. It has been stated that the inclemency of the weather on the third Monday of January is such that it would not make an inauguration a pleasant function. It so happens that I have caused the records to be examined, and find that the third Monday of January is usually more pleasant than the 4th of March.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I rather imagine the people would be willing to ratify a new President now in any kind of weather.

Mr. ASHURST. I almost despair of securing at this session of the Congress the submission of this amendment which I have introduced. Animadversions have been made upon the present system of permitting hold-over or lame-duck Members of Congress to make laws. As to that feature of the argument, on this side there are some members going out of the Senate whom we all ardently wish were going to continue here. Those on this side who leave us on the 4th of March may have successors, but their places will not easily be filled.

I am, however, encouraged by the thought that the circumstance which led to the formation of the Federal Constitution was the debility of the Continental Congress. There is no American but who thrills when he reads of the Continental Congress. After the Revolutionary War was over, that inept Continental Congress proved even more inept and inefficient, and as time went on that ineptitude progressively increased, and that was what in some measure caused the formation of the Federal Constitution.

The last thing, and surely one of the great things which the Continental Congress did, was performed by lame-duck Members of the Continental Congress. They adopted and passed the Ordinance of 1787, setting up the machinery whereby we now have five great States as monuments to the liberality and generosity of Virginia, and the General Government as a whole, and the bringing of those five States into being proved to be the action which I believe was the last important act of the Continental Congress.

So it is here to-day. Those Members who, through the mutations of politics or because they have constituencies, such as Aristides had, are about to leave us, could do no more worthy thing, could do no greater thing for their country and for their Government, than to help us submit the amendment which will provide that in the case of all amendments hereafter submitted the people shall be consulted, that there shall be a vote of the people in each State, and that in respect to the election of President and Senators and Representatives, as soon as may be with decency and with propriety the newly elected official shall be inaugurated to take up the burden and to begin the work of the people.

I hope that those who on the 4th of March will leave us, as we in our turn on some 4th of March shall also leave here, will become profoundly impressed with the importance of rendering this most signal service to this Republic, by helping us to submit these amendments I have outlined.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some data respecting the ratification of the various amendments to the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DISCUSSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

(Jameson.)

SEC. 585. VI. Two further questions may be considered: (1) When Congress has submitted amendments to the States, can it recall them? and (2) How long are amendments thus submitted open to adoption or rejection by the States?

1. The first question must, we think, receive a negative answer. When Congress has submitted amendments at the time deemed by itself or its constituents desirable to concede to that body the power of afterwards recalling them would be to give to it that of definitely rejecting such amendments, since the recall would withdraw them from the consideration of the States and thus render their adoption impossible. However this may be, it is enough to justify a negative answer to say that the Federal Constitution, from which alone Congress derives its power to submit amendments to the States, does not provide for recalling them upon any event or condition, and that the power to recall can not be considered as involved in that to submit as necessary to its complete execution. It therefore can not exist.

2. The same consideration will perhaps furnish the answer to the second question. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to submit amendments to the States; that is, either to the State legislatures or to conventions called by the States for this purpose, but there it stops. No power is granted to prescribe conditions as to the time within which the amendments are to be ratified, and hence to do so would be to transcend the power given. The practice of Congress in such cases has always conformed to the implied limitations of the Constitution. It has contented itself with proposing amendments to be come valid as parts of the Constitution according to the terms of that instrument. It is therefore possible, though hardly probable, that an amendment once proposed is always open to adoption by the nonacting or nonratifying States.

The better opinion would seem to be that an alteration of the Constitution proposed to-day has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of to-day, and that, if not ratified early, while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived and not again to be voted upon unless a second time proposed by Congress.

SEC. 586. In discussing the question of the right of the States to vote upon proposed amendments at any time after the date of their proposal it is proper to look into the consequences of such a right. If they have the right, there are now floating about us as it were in nebulous several amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress which have received the ratification of one or more States but not of enough to make them valid as parts of that instrument. Congress could not withdraw them, and there is in force in regard to them no recognized statute of limitations. Unless abrogated by amendments subsequently adopted they are, on the hypothesis stated, still before the American people to be adopted or rejected.

In 1873 the Senate of Ohio, acting upon the theory that once proposed an amendment to the Constitution is always open to ratification, adopted a joint resolution ratifying the second of the 12 amendments submitted to the States by Congress in 1789, but then rejected, providing that "no law varying the compensation of Members of Congress shall take effect until an election for Representatives shall have intervened." This resolution, prepared by Madison, was an excellent one; but suppose it had been unjust, proposed, perhaps, in the interest of a section or of a party, and, failing at the time to receive the requisite majority, it had subsequently by a concerted rally of those interested in its adoption been carried without discussion or a clear expression of the existing public will; is that a true construction of the Constitution which may be followed by so dangerous consequences? And supposing the right referred to exists, by what majority shall the resurrected amendments be adopted? If proposed in 1789, when the States numbered but 13 and when a majority of 10 States might have ratified the amendment, how many would have been requisite in 1873, when there were 38 States which would have been called upon to vote? If the answer should be that 29 States must have voted to ratify, since that number was three-fourths of all the States in 1873, however reasonable such an answer might seem, it would be founded upon no statute or custom of the country, and therefore different opinions as to its reasonableness might well be entertained. Hence the danger of confusion or conflict. We discuss this question here merely to emphasize the dangers involved in the Constitution as it stands and to show the necessity of legislation to make certain those points upon which doubts may arise in the employment of the constitutional process for amending the fundamental law of the Nation. A constitutional statute of limitation prescribing the time within which proposed amendments shall be adopted or be treated as waived ought by all means to be passed. (Jameson, John A. A treatise on constitutional conventions (4th ed., 1887), pp. 634–636.)

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES PROPOSED BY CONGRESS BUT NOT RATIFIED BY THREE-FOURTHS OF THE STATES, COLLATED BY SENATOR ASHURST.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons. (1 Stat. 97.) (Submitted at the same time as those which became part of the Constitution as amendments 1 to 10.)

Proposed by Congress September 15, 1789.

Ratified by the following States:

New Jersey, November 20, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 199, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

Maryland, December 19, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 106, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

North Carolina, December 22, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 103, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

New Hampshire, January 25, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 105, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

New York, March 27, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 53, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)
Rhode Island, June 15, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 110, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)
Virginia, October 25, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 30, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)
Pennsylvania, September 21, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 11, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)
Vermont, November 3, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 98, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)
Pennsylvania had first rejected the proposed amendment March 10, 1790.
Rejected by Delaware January 28, 1790.
The Journals give no record of the action of the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Georgia.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened. (1 Stat. 97.) (Submitted at the same time as those which became part of the Constitution as amendments 1 to 10:)
Proposed by Congress September 15, 1789.
Ratified by Congress September 15, 1789.
Maryland, December 19, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 106, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)
South Carolina, January 19, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 50, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)
Delaware, January 28, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 35, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)
Virginia, December 15, 1791. Senate Journal, p. 69, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)
Rejected by New Jersey, November 20, 1789 (Senate Journal, p. 199, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); New Hampshire, January 25, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 105, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); Pennsylvania, March 10, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 39, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); New York, March 27, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 53, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); Rhode Island, June 15, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 110, 1st Cong., 2d sess.).
The Journals give no record of the action of the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Georgia.

TITLES OF NOBILITY.

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them or either of them. (2 Stat. 613.)
Proposed by Congress May 1, 1810.
Ratified by the following States:
Maryland, December 25, 1810.
Kentucky, January 31, 1811.
Ohio, January 31, 1811.
Delaware, February 2, 1811.
Pennsylvania, February 6, 1811.
New Jersey, February 13, 1811.
Vermont, October 24, 1811.
Tennessee, November 21, 1811.
Georgia, December 13, 1811.
North Carolina, December 23, 1811.
Massachusetts, February 27, 1812.
New Hampshire, December 10, 1812.
Rejected by New York (senate) March 12, 1811; Connecticut, May session, 1813; South Carolina, approved by senate November 28, 1811, reported unfavorably in house and not further considered December 7, 1813; Rhode Island, September 15, 1814.

AMENDMENT ABOLISHING OR INTERFERING WITH SLAVERY PROHIBITED (CORWIN AMENDMENT).

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.)
Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.
Ratified by the following States:
Ohio, March 13, 1861.
Maryland, January 10, 1862.
Illinois (convention), February 14, 1862.

ATTEMPTS TO REGULATE RATIFICATION.

On May 23, 1866, when the resolution proposing the fourteenth amendment was under consideration, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, submitted an amendment to add to the resolution the following additional section:
"SEC. 6. This amendment shall be passed upon in each State by the legislature thereof which shall be chosen, or the members of the most popular branch of which shall be chosen, next after the submission of the amendment, and at its first session; and no acceptance or rejection shall be reconsidered or again brought in question at any subsequent session; nor shall any acceptance of the amendment be valid if made after three years from the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 36, p. 2771.)
When the fifteenth amendment was before the Senate on February 3, 1869, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, proposed to add to the resolution submitting it to the States the words:
"That the foregoing amendment shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States, the most numerous branch of which shall be chosen next after the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, p. 828.)
His speech in support of this proposal on February 5, 1869, is reported in the Congressional Globe, volume 40, pages 912 and 913. On February 9, 1869, this amendment was rejected—yeas 13, nays 43.
On February 17, 1869, an amendment practically identical with the above was offered by Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, and the constitutionality of such a limitation was discussed by Senators Morton, Bayard, Buckalew, Dixon, and Yates. The question being taken, the amendment was rejected—yeas 12, nays 40. (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, pp. 1311–1314.)

On January 30, 1882, Mr. Berry, of California, introduced a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116, 47th Cong., 1st sess.) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to regulate ratification, as follows:
"SECTION 1. The legislature of a State shall not vote upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States except at a regular session held following an election of the members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, which election must take place subsequent to the time of submission by Congress or a convention of the proposed amendment.
"SEC. 2. This amendment shall not take effect until the 5th of March, 1885."
On March 17, 1869, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, introduced in the Senate, and on March 29, 1869, Mr. Shanks, of Indiana, introduced in the House identical joint resolutions (S. J. Res. 32 and H. J. Res. 57, 41st Cong., 1st sess.), which read as follows:
"Be it resolved, etc., That on the sixth legislative day of a regular session, or of a legally called special session, of any State legislature, each house of said legislature, at the hour of 12 meridian, shall proceed to the consideration of any amendment of the Constitution of the United States that may have been submitted by the Congress of the United States to the legislatures of the several States for ratification, according to the provisions of the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That such amendment may not have been acted upon at any preceding session of said legislature. And if, upon the consideration of such amendment, it shall receive the votes of a majority of the members elected to each house of said legislature, it shall be held to be duly ratified by such legislature. And if final action is not taken upon the first day, then the house shall meet the next day at the same hour and so continue to meet from day to day (Sundays excepted) until final action is taken upon such amendment. Nor shall the action of either house of said legislature upon such amendment be hindered or prevented by the resignation or withdrawal, or the refusal to qualify, of a minority of either or of both houses of said legislature.
"SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That if such amendment or amendments shall be ratified according to the provisions of the preceding section, the same shall be duly certified by the officers of each house and shall be transmitted by the governor of the State to the President of the United States."

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, this is the natal day of the immortal founder of the Republican Party, and the full attendance upon the right-hand side of the Chamber to the duties which devolve upon the members of that party now shows that they rival even the immortal Lincoln in their faithful attendance to the business of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator said there was a full attendance on the Republican side of the Chamber. He was speaking ironically, I suppose, as I see but one member of that party over there.

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly I was speaking ironically. It shows that they realize, as Lincoln realized, the burdens of their day and generation and by their studious attendance and their presence here are endeavoring to do as he did in his lifetime, prove worthy of the trust reposed in them.

Could Abraham Lincoln, like Peter Grimm, return to Congress to-day, oh, how lonesome he would be.

In the maintenance of the rights of men, without regard to race or color or creed, two lofty spirts, separated by the lapse of three-quarters of a century, are silhouetted, mountainlike, against the history of the past.

Strange as it may seem, the father of democracy and the founder of republicanism were the exponents of the same essential and eternal principle, that it is the function of government to vest all men, without regard to wealth or culture or condition, with the greatest measure of individual independence consistent with the maintenance of an organized society.

History must recall that the two great emancipators were Lincoln and Jefferson. To the one is due the abolition of the slave trade and to the other the institution of chattel slavery.

Apprehensive of Federal aggression, Lincoln warned his countrymen in his day that it was—

No child's play to save the principles of Thomas Jefferson from total overthrow in this Nation.

No man more sincerely admired or more thoroughly understood the complete accord between himself and Thomas Jefferson upon basic and eternal principles than Abraham Lincoln.

All honor to Thomas Jefferson—said he—

to a man who in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people, had the coolness, forecast and capacity to introduce into a mere revolutionary document an abstract truth applicable to all men and all times, and so to embalm it there that to-day and in all coming days it shall be a rebuke and stumbling block to the harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression.

Had the Civil War determined not the right of a State to secede but the right of a State to exist, Abraham Lincoln would to-day be canonized by many ardent patriots in both political parties. As it is, should he return in the flesh to-day, I fear his old-fashioned notions of personal liberty and the inviolate rights of the States would render him an Ishmaelite upon either side of the Chamber, and whether he took his seat upon the right or the left, he would certainly be damned as a hopeless reactionary.

In his first inaugural address, he declared that those who nominated and elected him—

Placed in the platform for my acceptance and as a law to themselves and to me the clear and emphatic resolution that I now read—

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends."

It is my duty and my oath to maintain inviolate the rights of the States and to order and control, under the Constitution, their own affairs by their own judgment exclusively. Such maintenance is essential for the preservation of that balance of power on which our institutions rest.

To-day there are pending more than two score amendments to the Constitution, the purpose of which, in the main, is to deprive these States, in the language of the Republican platform of 1861, "of the power to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively."

In his first political speech, Abraham Lincoln declared: "I am in favor of internal improvements," and he was the champion of internal improvements until the day of his death. Never since the birth of Abraham Lincoln has the agricultural or industrial life of this country been in greater need of internal improvements or an adequate transportation system, and yet I am advised that the President of the United States to-day proposes to nullify an appropriation of the measly sum of $56,000,000 for the improvement of our waterways, in the face of the fact that our common carriers are admittedly impotent to render an adequate service. Lincoln, above all others, tenderly safeguarded the rights of the soldier and stoutly maintained the duty of the Government to adequately compensate his heroic service. To-day he is excluded from public office by political henchmen and denied compensation at the demand of high finance. The man who placed "the man above the dollar" would place the bonus above the bond. Lincoln would, if living to-day, be a political apostate or an advocate of the bonus.

In its indifference to the rights of men, to the service of heroes, and in its subservience to special privilege and to special interests the present administration may trace its lineage direct and unquestioned to Alexander Hamilton, the great protagonist of caste and privilege. In subsidizing the rich and plundering the poor it is the party of Hamilton, pure and simple, but it has nothing in common with the great defenders of the rights of men—Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no desire to talk now on the motion I have made, if other Senators for any reason want to talk first. I have yielded to several others. If the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] desires to speak now I shall be glad to yield the floor to him.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to speak just for a few moments.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to curtail any Senator, but before my motion is voted on I want to make a further explanation of it. I yield the floor at this time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from the State of Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] cause me to desire to say a few words at this time. He has spoken of the great Lincoln, the great commoner, the great statesman, who was a friend of the common masses of the common people. As he spoke of him in this Chamber and referred to him as being the father of the Republican Party, I wondered what he would think if he could come back to life and come into this historic Senate hall, where free speech was one of the things prized by the statesmen of his day and by statesmen before that time, and even by the statesmen of this time—with emphasis upon the word "statesmen." I wondered, if Lincoln could come back and they should tell him as he came into the Capitol that the Republican Senate by a large partisan vote had said that a Senator could not declare in this Chamber "that he did not represent the bond sharks and big financiers of Wall Street," what he would say. Why, Lincoln would say that the Republican Party has become degenerate, an unclean thing, the common tool and handy instrument of the predatory interests of the country.

I thought, as the Senator from Kentucky was speaking of the great Lincoln, of the record made by the present day time-serving Republican Party in this Chamber just a few days ago, when we were discussing the debt settlement with Great Britain. A marvelous piece of diplomatic achievement for Great Britain is that settlement. I used this language:

I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State. I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street.

That is as far as I got. I offended the leaders of the Republican Party with that statement. I have wondered frequently just why it was they stopped me at that point. I have been thinking about it since, and I have wondered if the high "muck-a-mucks" of Wall Street—the big financiers and bond sharks, if you please—had been complaining to the leaders of the Republican Party down here. I wondered if they have not been whispering something like this into their ears:

"You are permitting HEFLIN and other Senators down there to talk about us up here in Wall Street, and we see no effort on your part to stop him or them. We are not going to tolerate that. We furnished your campaign funds. We are the power behind the throne in your party, and yet you permit the Senators on the other side of the Chamber to get up and criticize the doings of Wall Street. We have not heard one of you yet administer a severe rebuke to one of those Senators who dares to criticize the conduct of Wall Street. We want that situation changed. We want to see you get a move on in this matter. The very first one that assaults Wall Street hereafter, we want you to rise in your place and stop him on the spot. Make a point of order and call him down. Have you no written rules in the Senate that will protect Wall Street? If you have no rule in the Senate that will protect Wall Street, will not your Presiding Officer sustain the point of order if you make it; and if he does sustain it, and they appeal from his decision, can you not get enough Republicans to sustain a proposition which seeks to favor and protect Wall Street? If you will not do the thing necessary to shield and protect Wall Street when she is assailed by a Senator, we will not give you another nickel. Do you get that? Put that in your pipe and smoke it."

Mr. President, when I got up the other day and said I was not here to represent the bond sharks and big financiers of Wall Street the leader of the Republican Party [Mr. LODGE] rose and made a point of order. I was astounded. I wondered what had happened to the Senator. They reduced my language to writing. Here it is. I wish I could read it loud enough for everybody in the United States to hear it. This is the language objected to and against which a point of order was made by the Senator from Massachusetts:

I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State. I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street.

That is as far as I got. I offended the leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate. I trespassed upon the proprieties of the occasion with them, and I was called to order and requested by the Presiding Officer to take my seat until the matter was disposed of. I, a Senator from a sovereign State, speaking against sinister interests in Wall Street, that literally control the Republican Party to-day, as I was aiming shafts of criticism against the Wall Street octopus, whose tentacles hold the Government by the throat at this hour—when I dared to stand in my place and criticize Wall Street they did not answer my arguments. They did not deny the correctness of my statements. They did not flash their scintillating blades in the arena of debate upon the question, but they invoked the aid of their Presiding Officer and violated all the precedents of the Senate. They resorted to strong-arm methods and called me down. Such a method has been the handy instrument of tyrants for all time; when they can not answer your argument they lay their hands upon you.

I want to read what I said just prior to the point of order. The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] read it the next morning when he made the position of those who voted to sustain the Chair look miserable and measly. Here is what I was saying. I was putting my finger on the sore spot. I was going to the headwaters. That is why they wanted to stop me.

I read from the RECORD of February 1, 1923, page 2831:

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wanted to go on record as saying a word in behalf of some of the statements of my friend, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]—I did not hear all of his speech—and to speak for the American people somewhat about a debt that is due to them. Does Wall Street want to collect her money from Great Britain and have this whole debt held up until she can collect it? She did have it held up, it seems, until she collected $1,700,000,000 from France and Great Britain. Does she want to have this debt held up for 62 years so she can go on undisturbed and collect the other money due her from the various countries? I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State; I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street. I want the American people to have a fair deal.

My God! here in the same Hall where we eulogize the great Lincoln that remarkable performance took place. Why, Mr. President, if Lincoln could come into this Hall to-day he would lash the Republicans out of it, as Christ drove the money changers out of the temple at Jerusalem. Talk about the party of Lincoln! There is nothing to remind one of Lincoln in the Republican Party as it exists to-day—I am talking about the leaders of it, the big bosses—in the time-serving Republican Party as we know it now. There are many of the rank and file in that party who feel just as I do and just as the Democratic rank and file feel.

I have received, I suppose, a hundred letters from Republicans since that remarkable incident took place the other day in this Chamber. Many of those letters begin by saying, "While I am a Republican, I hang my head in shame at the conduct indulged in in stopping you when you said you were trying to represent the people," and so forth. Others say, "I am a Republican, but I condemn the conduct of the Republican Senate."

These are the things which are transpiring here in the closing hours of the session of Congress when the ship subsidy bill is hanging in the balance in the Senate. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], clever, smooth artist that he is, is handling this measure in splendid fashion; he hopes to get it through, and I guess he thinks he will get it through. When I was speaking here the other night, going right to the meat of another issue, I was stopped. I have wondered if that was done as a feeler, in order to intimidate other Senators and to make them exceedingly careful about what they were going to say when we get into the ship-subsidy debate. If they could pick me out and stop me when I was saying that I did not represent Wall Street, and they could have me take my seat, perhaps it was thought that more timid Senators might refrain from saying anything. Well, Senators on the other side of the Chamber have another thought coming to them. Before they get through with the ship-subsidy fight they are going to hear some pretty plain talk on this side of the Chamber on that subject.

The ship subsidy plan involves the biggest deal of all the big deals that this administration has put over, and the country is entitled to know the truth about it. Senators owe it to themselves, they owe it to the oaths which they have taken in this Chamber, and they owe it to the people whom they are supposed to serve, to tell the truth and the whole truth about that question. There never was such a propaganda carried on as is going on now in certain newspapers boosting this bill, pressing for the ship subsidy, and trying to drive into a corner and silence those who dare to open their mouths against it.

However, Mr. President, I rose at this time to say a few words about Lincoln, the "man of sorrow" who stood at Gettysburg and said, "Let us here highly resolve * * * that this Nation, under God, * * * shall not perish from the earth." I call upon every Democrat in the land, and upon every Republican in the land, to let us all on this Lincoln's birthday reconsecrate our hearts, our strength, and our all to the highest and best interests of our common country. Let us resolve to-day that this Government shall not perish from the earth; let us resolve that free speech in this Chamber shall live, and that a clean and honest free press shall live. Free speech and free press are twin angels of good for the Government, but suppressed speech and a venal, corrupt press are millstones about the neck of the Republic. Let us fight the latter and uphold the former. Let us follow Lincoln's suggestion and make sure that this Government shall endure. Let each one of us remember that day by day we either contribute to its strength and its glory, or we contribute toward dragging it down the way that other nations have gone in the long night of time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when I had the floor previously on the pending motion I outlined what I had agreed to do, so far as I was able to do so, in the way of eliminating portions of the joint resolution so as to confine it entirely to the term of office of the Members of the House and of the Senate. I now ask unanimous consent that there be printed in bill form a copy of the joint resolution showing the proposed amendments so that Senators may see at a glance just what the effect of the changes will be and what portions of the joint resolution will remain. I have been asked by a number of Senators since I last had the floor and who did not hear the explanation what would be left in the joint resolution; and, if it shall not be disposed of to-day, the reprint showing the proposed changes will be on the desks of Senators to-morrow, and they will be able to see just what the joint resolution is designed to accomplish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall not object, but I should like to ask the Senator a question. Did the Senator in his remarks call attention to those portions of the joint resolution which he intended to strike out?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. What I want to do is to have the joint resolution printed as a bill is printed when reported by a committee, showing the amendments recommended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection the order was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 253) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote, be printed, showing the proposed amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was making an explanation of the joint resolution which proposes an amendment to the Constitution when I yielded the floor to other Senators who were anxious to speak on it without any delay. If the changes which I have suggested shall be made and the joint resolution shall be passed and then ratified by the legislatures of the States so that it shall become a part of the Constitution of the United States it will have this effect: Senators and Members of the House of Representatives elected at the general election in November will take their seats the first Monday of January thereafter; their terms of office will commence at that time, and Congress will convene in annual session at that time. Therefore those Members of the House and of the Senate elected in November will assume the duties of their office within two months of the time when they were chosen.

Another effect would be that there would be no such thing as a short session of Congress. The term of Members of the House and of the Senate would commence on the first Monday in January at the same time when the session of Congress would commence, and a Congress would not terminate by the expiration of the terms on the 4th day of March of Members of the House and one-third of the Senate, as is the case now, every other year.

Mr. President, that one proposition, which is not discussed very often by those who consider this question, is of great importance. The point will be immediately appreciated by all of those who have any experience with the work of Congress. We are right now in the closing days of a short session which must terminate on the 4th day of March because the term of office of one-third of the Members of the Senate and of all the Members of the House expires at that time. Congress can not regularly convene until the first Monday in December, and following that come the Christmas holidays, which always interfere with the work of Congress. So we never get down to real work until about the 1st of January or a little thereafter.

It is a physical impossibility, Mr. President, for the Congress to consider with any mature deliberation important questions of legislation within the life of a short session, and at the same time properly to consider and pass the necessary appropriation bills to keep the Government running for another year.

The result is we must either throw aside much proposed legislation of a great deal of importance without considering it at all, or we must consider it in a "half-baked" fashion and dispense with much of the debate that ought to take place on and much of the consideration that ought to be given to the appropriation bills. We do a little of both of those things. Important matters of legislation are killed because of want of time. Other matters of appropriation in which the country is vitally interested, where hundreds of millions of dollars are involved, are given but scant consideration because we have not the time if we take up the other things; and every Member of each House is interested in a great many other matters of legislation that he thinks he will get more time to accomplish by shortening the consideration of these appropriation bills. The result is bad legislation in the short session, half-baked, unfinished legislation. Another result is that we must necessarily kill good legislation because of the want of time to consider it.

If this amendment were part of the Constitution, such a condition could not exist. We would not have, as a rule, any extended filibustering in the Senate. There would be no limit of time up to which we could work and then would have to quit as a matter of law. Every session of Congress could last an entire year if it were necessary to do the business.

Moreover, when we have a short session of Congress and do not finish the business before us, as has been the case almost universally for eight years, a special session is called. That means increased expense to the taxpayers. That means additional work for Members of Congress. It means that by the time the special session is called and organized and gotten into operation we are in the hot season of the year, and everybody knows that we can not get good legislation; that we can not get the best of legislation in the city of Washington when we are trying to legislate in July and August, when the weather is almost unbearable and good work can not be done. That would be obviated. Special sessions would become practically an unknown thing.

That is only one thing that would be brought about. It is not usually considered the most important. As a matter of fact, it is of very much more importance than it is usually considered to be.

Another thing would be, Mr. President, that the new Congress elected in November would go into office and go into active duty in the January following. I do not know myself of any reason why a Congress elected in November should wait until a year from the following December before it actually commences operations, and yet that is what it does now unless the President calls a special session. There is not a State legislature in the United States where a similar condition exists. Not in a single instance in the civilized world is there a parliament or a legislature that, after it is elected, must wait for a year and a month before it commences to legislate; and yet in a democracy, in what is supposed to be the freest and the greatest country in the world, where freedom prevails, where the will of the people is the law of the land, that is the kind of a condition that we find.

I do not know of anybody who defends it. I can not myself conceive of a single argument in favor of that kind of a condition, and yet that is the condition that exists here.

The only objection that I have ever heard to this proposition was to the effect that "We had better not tamper with the Constitution."

Let us see. When the Constitution of the United States was made, Mr. President, no time was fixed, and none is now fixed, providing for the beginning of the term of office of a Member of the House or of the Senate. The Constitution says that the term of a Senator shall be six years, and the term of a Member of the House of Representatives shall be two years; but it does not fix the beginning or the end. As a matter of fact, the only reason why the 4th of March became the beginning and the end of congressional terms was because that was when they were organized. That was when the Congress provided by statute that the new Congressmen should go into office; and, of course, the term beginning then, when it had lasted two years it ended then. The framers of the Constitution did not know, at the time they adopted the Constitution, that we were going to have such a foolish condition.

Moreover, some reason existed in those days why more time should elapse. Railroads were unknown, the telegraph was undiscovered, and even the roads to travel on were mere trails. Automobiles had not come into use, and ox teams and mule and horse teams were the only way they had to go from one part of the country to another. It was months before one part of the country knew how another part of the country had voted. It was months before the people in the remote parts of the country knew who had been elected President; and, of course, under those conditions expedition could not take place. It was necessary that there should be more delay than now.

Another reason was that the Constitution provided that Senators should be elected by the State legislatures. They did not meet, as a rule, until after the 1st of January. It was sometimes late in their session before they succeeded in electing a Senator, and on that account there was some reason why there should be a delay.

All those things have passed away. None of them exist now; and, as far as I know, Mr. President, not a single objection of any kind has ever been raised against this proposed change. Is it not queer, Mr. President, that something that everybody is for nobody can get? Is it not queer that in a democracy like ours, where we have a unanimous Senate and a unanimous House wanting to vote for this proposition, we can not get it? Is it not queer that in our country, where throughout its length and breadth, as far as I know, no voice has been raised against this change, and everyone who has spoken has spoken in its favor, we can not bring it about? Are we so far removed from what we want to do ourselves and from what our people want us to do that we can not accomplish anything?

Right now it is said: "Why, I am in favor of this proposition, but I can not vote for your motion to take it up, because by doing so I would displace the so-called ship subsidy bill." But, Mr. President, I do not know how to get it up without displacing the ship subsidy bill; and the ship subsidy bill is going to be here, very likely, until the 4th of March, and stand as a barrier to progress, stand in the way of doing something that everybody wants to see done.

Who is it that is opposed to this? Who is it that does not want to propose this amendment? Who is it that condemns it? Let him rise in the Senate, and let us see who he is. He has not so far said a word or entered a word of protest; and yet we are confronted with the peculiar parliamentary situation that because we must have a ship subsidy bill we can not get anything else until we get that.

Mr. President, I think the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], made at some length an hour or two ago in regard to the ship subsidy bill as it is connected with this proposition, were to the point. Without finding fault with any man as to his standing or his belief on the ship-subsidy measure—it must be apparent, it is apparent it is known to everybody, it is an open secret—that if the Congress elected in November were here now doing business the ship subsidy bill would not be here; nobody would propose it. It is known that it would not pass. There is only one way to pass it, and that is to pass it through a Congress whose successors have already been elected; when, because of a peculiar condition of our Constitution that came about, as I have explained to a great degree by accident as far as the beginning of the term is concerned, the new Congress is unable to operate.

What would you say if this condition existed in your State? Just take it home to your own State. Suppose that the State, let us say, of Washington, represented here so ably by the senior Senator from that State [Mr. JONES], had a provision in its constitution that the members of the State legislature should be elected in November, that their term of office should not begin until the 4th of March, and that there was no way on earth for them to assemble even after that unless the governor called them, and that the first time when under the law they could meet and do business for that State would be a year from the following December after they had been elected. Do you suppose that the people of Washington, intelligent, patriotic, and progressive as I know they are, would stand for that kind of a proposition? Where is the State that would submit to such a thing? Point to me the civilized government anywhere under God's sun that would stand for it. There is not one anywhere to-day; and yet in free, great America that is our condition, and we are so helpless that although all the people want this change, and all the Senators want it, and all the Members of the House want it, nobody can get it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a part of my remarks the report that I made from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on this joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The report (No. 933) submitted by Mr. NORRIS on December 5, 1922, is as follows:

Report to accompany Senate Concurrent Resolution 29.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, having had under consideration S. Con. Res. 29, beg leave to report thereon as follows:

This resolution undertakes to express the sense of the Senate to the effect that Members of Congress defeated at the recent election should abstain from voting on anything but routine legislation, and that chairmen of committees not in sympathy with the people's wishes as expressed at the polls should resign from their respective chairmanships.

The passage of such a resolution would not only be unwise, but if it were complied with it would interfere with the constitutional right and privilege of many Members of Congress. Under our Constitution a Member's right, if not his duty, to participate fully in all legislation up to the close of his constitutional term can not be questioned or denied.

The resolution, however, does call attention to a very serious defect in some of the provisions of the Constitution. The passage of the resolution, however, would not bring a remedy, and your committee, after due consideration, has reached the conclusion that it should report to the Senate for its action a proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States that will in the judgment of the committee bring relief from the conditions pointed out by the concurrent resolution.

Under existing conditions a new Congress does not actually convene in regular session until a year and one month after its Members have been elected. When our Constitution was adopted there was some reason for such a long intervention of time between the election and the actual commencement of work by the new Congress. We had neither railroads nor telegraphic communication connecting the various States and communities of the country. Under present conditions, however, the result of elections is known all over the country within a few hours after the polls close, and the Capital City is within a few days' travel of the remotest portions of the country.

Originally, Senators were elected by the legislatures, and as a rule the legislatures of the various States did not convene until after the beginning of the new year, and it was difficult and sometimes impossible for Senators to be elected until February or March. Since the adoption of the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution, however, Senators have been elected by the people at the same election at which Members of the House are elected. There is no reason, therefore, why the Congress elected in November should not be sworn in and actually enter upon the duties of office at least as soon as the beginning of the new year following their election.

The only direct opportunity that the citizens of the country have to express their ideas and their wishes in regard to national legislation is the expression of their will through the election of their Representatives at the general election in November. During the campaign that precedes this election the great questions demanding attention at the hands of the new Congress are discussed at length before the people and throughout the country, and it is only fair to presume that the Members of Congress chosen at that election fairly represent the ideas of a majority of the people of the country as to what legislation is desirable. In a Government "by the people" the wishes of a majority should be crystallized into legislation as soon as possible after these wishes have been made known. These mandates should be obeyed within a reasonable time.

Under existing conditions, however, more than a year elapses before the will of the people expressed at the election can be put into statutory law. This condition of affairs is not only unfair to the citizenship at large, who have expressed their will as to what legislation they desire, but it is likewise unfair to their servants whom they have elected to carry out this will. It is true that it is within the power of the President to call an extraordinary session of Congress at an earlier date than the one provided by law, but the new Congress can not be called into extraordinary session until after the 4th of March, which would not give the new Congress very much time for the consideration of important national questions before the summer heat in the Capital City makes even existence difficult and good work almost impossible. It is conceded by all that the best time for legislatures to do good work is during the winter months. Practically all the States of the Union recognize this fact and provide for the meeting of their legislatures near the 1st of January. Moreover, the wishes of the country having been expressed at an election should not be dependent for their carrying out upon the will of the President alone. Provision should be made by law so that the new Congress could begin the performance of its important duties as soon after election as possible and under conditions that are the most favorable for good work. Under existing conditions a Member of the House of Representatives does not get started in his work until the time has arrived for renominations in his district. He has accomplished nothing and has not had an opportunity to accomplish anything because Congress has not been in session. He has made no record upon which to go before his people for election. It is unfair both to him and to the people of his district. In case of a contest over a seat in the House of Representatives, history has shown that the term of office has practically expired before the House is able to settle the question as to who is entitled to the contested seat. During all this time the occupant of the seat has been drawing the salary; and if it is decided in the end that the occupant was wrongfully seated, then the entire salary must again be paid to the person who has been unjustly deprived of his seat. Double pay is therefore drawn from the Treasury of the United States and the people of the district have not been represented by the Member whom they selected for that purpose. No reason has been given, and undoubtedly it is correct to say that none can be given, why a new Congress elected at a general election to translate into law the wishes of the people should not be installed into office practically as soon as the results of the election can be determined.

The question is sometimes asked, Why is an amendment to the Constitution necessary to bring about this desirable change? Congress has authority under the Constitution to change the day upon which Congress shall convene, but it can not put this time prior to the 4th day of March, and thereby give the new Congress an opportunity to commence work, because the term of office of the new Congress under existing conditions does not commence until the 4th day of March following their election. It is true the Constitution does not provide the date when the terms of Senators and Representatives shall begin. It does fix the term of Senators at six years and of Members of the House of Representatives at two years. The commencement of the term of the first President and Vice President and of the Senators and Representatives composing the first Congress was fixed by act of Congress adopted September 13, 1788, and that act provided "that the first Wednesday in March next be the time for commencing proceedings under the Constitution." It happened that the first Wednesday in March was the 4th day of March, and hence the terms of the President and Vice President and Members of Congress begin on the 4th day of March. Since the Constitution provides that the term of Senators shall be six years and the term of Members of the House of Representatives two years, it follows that this change can not be made without changing the terms of office of Senators and Representatives, which would in effect be a change of the Constitution. By another act (the act of March 1, 1792) Congress provided that the terms of President and Vice President should commence on the 4th day of March after their election. It seems clear, therefore, that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary to give relief from existing conditions.

The necessary constitutional change to fix the beginning of the terms of President and Vice President and of Members of Congress and to place such time soon after the general election, thus enabling the wishes of the people to be translated into law, is only a step in placing the people more directly in control of their Government. If it is desirable that the wishes of the people as expressed at the ballot box should have the effect of law so far as Senators and Representatives are concerned, it is equally important and desirable that the same rule should apply to the selection of a President and Vice President. The President under our Constitution is in reality part of the legislative machinery of the country. In fact, he probably has more influence over legislation than either branch of Congress. It is therefore just as important that the people have an opportunity to express their wishes as directly as possible as to who their Chief Magistrate should be as it is to express this wish in regard to Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. But the President and Vice President are not elected by a direct vote of the people. They are elected by electors, who are themselves selected in accordance with laws and regulations provided by the legislatures of the various States. The method provided by our Constitution for the election of a President is not only archaic but it stands as an impossible barrier across the road of progress and makes it impossible for the people to enjoy the freedom and rights that ought to come to the citizenship of a free democracy. It is completely out of date, and the wonder is that a liberty-loving people, who are sufficiently intelligent to govern themselves, should have permitted it to remain this long as a part of the organic law of the land. When our Government was founded and our Constitution was adopted it was more or less an experiment in the world of governmental affairs. The step which our forefathers took was greater than any that had ever been taken toward a free government; and yet, in the preparation of that wonderful document, our forefathers were fearful lest the step proposed to be taken should be too great and thus bring ruin instead of success. They deemed it wise to remove the governmental functions in most cases one or more steps from the direct control of the people to be governed. They provided that the President and Vice President should be elected by electors and that these electors in turn should be "appointed" according to the provisions of the various State legislatures. Senators were elected by the legislatures of the various States, and it took many years of agitation and work to secure an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of such officials.

That such change has been beneficial and helpful will not be denied by anyone. The same reasons that impel the adoption of a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of Senators would seem to demand that the President and Vice President should be elected by a direct vote of the people. No reason can be given why an independent people, capable of self-government, should not have the right to vote directly for the Chief Magistrate, who has more power than any other official in our Government. It is true that these presidential electors are pledged to vote for some particular man for President and for Vice President. At the very best, they are an unnecessary and useless part of our political machinery; but even though every candidate for presidential elector is pledged to vote for some particular man for President and Vice President, there can be no reason given for the existence of such an official. If he is only to carry out the will of the voter, why not do away with his office entirely and permit the voter to carry out his own will by a direct vote? Under existing conditions the names of all the candidates of all parties for presidential elector must be printed on the official ballot, and then there must be as many blank places left on the ballot, under the laws of the various States, as there are candidates for electors, giving the voter the right to write in the names of any other candidates for electors for whom he desires to vote. The result is that in all of our States the ballot is unreasonably and unnecessarily lengthy. In some of the larger States, where there are a large number of presidential electors, the official ballot is often from 25 to 30 feet in length.

All this could be avoided if the names of the candidates for President and Vice President were printed on the ballot and the voter given the right to directly express his choice. While the system is unnecessary, cumbersome, and confusing, and has no merit whatever that can be mentioned in its favor, it has an evil and disastrous effect and as a matter of fact often indirectly, but certainly, takes away from the voter the right to effectively express his will. Since no person has the legal right to vote directly for President and Vice President, and since presidential electors are named by political parties, pledged to vote for the nominee of their respective parties for both President and Vice President, it follows that it is a physical impossibility for a citizen to vote for the candidate for President in one party and the candidate for Vice President in another party. The ordinary citizen does not realize that his electoral right and privilege is thus curtailed. It is not often that voters would want to take such a course, but as a matter of fundamental justice we ought to be protected by law in taking such a course should we desire to do it. It is practically an impossibility for any person to become an independent candidate for the office of President. In theory this could be done. In practice it is just as much prohibited as though the right were denied by express term of the Constitution. This point is very important and bears directly upon the fundamental principle of the right of an ordinary citizen to be heard and to have his influence and his vote count in whatever direction he desires to use it. He is compelled, from the very nature of things, to vote for the candidate of some great political party, and the powers and influences which control the nominations in such parties, indirectly but very perfectly and completely, control the vote of the citizen, and in reality elects the President. The voter has nothing left but a choice between two evils.

Everybody knows that political conventions are very frequently manipulated and controlled by powerful secret influences that have selfish ends in view rather than the benefit of all the people. The machinery of a great political party of national scope is sufficient to enable those in control of that machinery to control the action of a national convention. Within the memory of all of us we have seen such control exercised, sometimes completely, and almost universally at least to a partial extent. If a few men under existing conditions are able to control nominations without consulting the wishes or wants of the voters, and if a nomination is necessary for election, then the only right given to the voter is that of choosing between two samples which are set before him. This is in reality a denial of suffrage. At least, the right of suffrage so given is not absolute and is little more than a hollow sham and mockery. As a matter of fact the actual practice always has been, and perhaps as long as the system lasts always will be, that the man or men who control political parties do it from selfish motives. They care but little about the wishes of the people. They are sometimes the representatives of special interests, and even though those who do the work directly may not ask or expect any benefit, those whom they in reality represent and who furnish the sinews of political warfare expect to benefit by national legislation or by presidential appointments of administrative officials. The people are not consulted, and the people have in reality no voice in the selection of their own President, whose power and influence in administrative directions is almost unlimited and who has more to do with their laws, their surroundings, with their environment, their country, and their happiness than any other one official.

Even though the people are dissatisfied, they are helpless, because it is practically impossible for anyone to be an independent candidate for President, no matter what demand there may be from the people in this respect. The Electoral College stands in the way. In order to run for President it is necessary to organize in every State and in every congressional district of every State, and to select candidates to become electors, pledged to the man who is to become the candidate. This takes not only time but a vast amount of money. For practical purposes it is an impossibility. If the Electoral College were abolished and the people allowed to vote directly for President, it would naturally follow that those who controlled political conventions would be more careful in their selection of nominees. Political conventions would pay more attention to the wishes of the people at large, and successful candidates would give closer adherence to preelection promises. If national political conventions were controlled by selfish interests and nominated candidates unsatisfactory to the people at large, it would be easy for the people to defeat such nominees by rallying behind an independent candidate for President. It would be a very easy matter to have printed on the official ballot in all the States the name of an independent candidate. This could be done without the organization of a new party and at very little if any expense; and when the voter went into the booth to cast his ballot, instead of a ballot 10 or 20 feet in length, he would be confronted with the actual names of presidential candidates on a space 2 or 3 inches in length. It would be a very simple procedure, inexpensive, and perfectly practical. Practically every State in the Union has what is known as an official ballot and provides by law for a method of putting names on this ballot. Such machinery is already provided for in the States and applies to every office except that of President and Vice President, and the reason it can not apply to those is because the Electoral College stands in the way. Under existing conditions we have no way of expressing our opinion. Our Constitution keeps from the people the right to be heard in the selection of a Chief Magistrate. If the people are competent to select Members of the House of Representatives, if they are likewise competent to vote directly for Senators, why should they not likewise have an opportunity to vote directly for President and Vice President?

To remedy the situation pointed out by the concurrent resolution referred to the committee, and which has been thus briefly discussed, we recommend in lieu of S. Con. Res. 29 the passage of the following resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the Senate, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President of the United States shall commence at noon on the third Monday in January following their election, and they shall be elected as follows: The choice of each State for President and Vice President shall be determined at a general election of the qualified electors of such State. The time of such election shall be the same throughout the United States, and unless the Congress shall by law appoint a different time such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November in the year preceding the expiration of the regular term of the President and Vice President. Each State shall be entitled to, and shall be given, as many votes for President and Vice President as the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress. Each State shall certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate, the result of said election. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of votes to which all of the States are entitled; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately the President. In choosing the President the votes shall be taken by roll call of the Members and all such votes shall be recorded in full in the Journal and a majority of all of the Representatives shall be necessary to a choice. If the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them before the third Monday in January next following, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice President shall be the Vice President if such number be a majority of the whole number of votes to which all of the States are entitled, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall, in like manner, choose the Vice President, and a majority of the whole number of Senators shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice President of the United States.

"SEC. 2. The terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election.

"SEC. 3. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 4. The terms of the President and Vice President who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall end at noon on the third Monday in January of the year in which such terms would otherwise have ended on the 4th day of March. The terms of Senators and Representatives who may be in office at the time of the adoption of this amendment shall end at noon on the first Monday in January of the year in which such terms would otherwise have ended on the 4th day of March."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent under which I think the Senator will have an opportunity to try to get his joint resolution through, and, in my judgment, will get it through.

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its business to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Before closing my remarks I intended to make that very suggestion to the Senator from Washington, and I assure him that I will do everything I can to secure favorable action on this joint resolution. I hope to get the assistance of the other Members of the Senate, like the Senator from Washington, who are in favor of this measure, and pass it, if we can, to-morrow in the morning hour. However, I want to be frank with the Senator from Washington. If I am not able to do that, I shall renew my motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall renew my motion to-morrow, if I am able to get recognition.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, a statement at which I was very much surprised appeared in the Washington Post of yesterday. It has been repeated in many papers of to-day, but has just been confirmed by a Republican Member of the Senate that the President of the United States has decided, notwithstanding the will of Congress expressed, he will not permit the expenditure of the appropriation made by Congress for river and harbor improvement. It was said yesterday in the Post that the President, by reason of the fact that he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and because the bill making the appropriation for the river and harbor improvements provides that these expenditures shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, has or will direct the Secretary not to approve the expenditures except those which he himself may favor, and that the total expenditure should not exceed $27,000,000, although the Congress made available $56,000,000.

An editorial which appeared in the New York Times of to-day calls attention to that report, and I take it that the editor had information which he thinks reliable that that is to be the President's attitude.

I hope the President has been misquoted. He is the Chief Executive. It is his duty to have the laws enforced. If it shall transpire that the President instead of enforcing the laws shall himself issue an Executive order forbidding the officers of the Government from obeying the law, it will be a very unfortunate circumstance. We have heard much recently, and especially from the Attorney General, to the effect that every man should bow to the law. If the President, the Chief Officer of this Republic, shall himself forbid the officers to obey the law, it will prove poor encouragement to other people to respect the law.

Congress saw fit, after the President had made his views known, to vote $56,000,000 for river and harbor improvements. Every Representative in the House and every Senator in this Chamber knew the President was opposed to that appropriation. Therefore there is no excuse upon the part of the Executive for refusing to obey the law on the ground that Congress did not realize what the Chief Executive wished. I hope this report is not well founded. It would be very unfortunate indeed if the President should take the position that because he can not be compelled to obey the law that he will set at naught the will of Congress, expressed by a substantial majority, and withhold from some sections of the country the appropriations which Congress has made to improve the waterways of that section, because he does not approve of the expenditure of the funds, or does not like the way the people vote there. If he shall do so, it will lead to an embarrassing situation, both for the Congress and for the President.

It comes with poor grace, indeed, for the President, urging and insisting as he is that Congress shall now pass a ship subsidy bill increasing the expenses of the Government millions of dollars through a measure the people tried in November to repudiate, and as just said by the Senator from Nebraska, if the President had waited until the new Congress came in that Congress would not pass. I say it comes with poor grace now for the President to say, "I do not care how hard pressed the Treasury may be for ready cash, I am going to drive through the Congress a ship subsidy which will cost the people hundreds of millions of dollars as a subsidy to private individuals, but as Chief Executive I shall ignore the will of the people, as registered by the Congress, and refuse to authorize expenditures for the improvement of rivers and harbors, because I do not happen to approve these projects."

Mr. President, the situation which will develop if the President shall make good that threat will be one that he at some time will regret as much as anyone else. The time has not yet come, however circumstances sometimes may lead people to suspect that it has, when the people are going to submit to the dominancy of the Chief Executive, whoever the President of this country may be. I hope that the advisers will take serious counsel with him before such a decision to ignore the will of the country shall be made by the President of these United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to have read at the desk a very interesting article from the Dearborn Independent, released this morning, touching the shipping question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

TWO HUNDRED DELEGATES AND BIG OFFICIALS OF CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE FROM OUR PRINCIPAL CITIES, REPRESENTING 150 OF OUR GREAT COMMERCIAL BODIES, SAILED SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, TO ITALY UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG TO ATTEND THE WORLD MEETING OF THE INTERNATIONAL CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AT ROME IN MARCH—THESE ARE THE IDENTICAL CIVIC BODIES THAT INDORSED THE SHIP SUBSIDY BILL—THEY CHARTERED A BRITISH SHIP AND PAY ABOUT $350,000 OF GOOD AMERICAN MONEY FOR IT, WHILE THE SHIPPING BOARD HAS HUNDREDS OF SHIPS TIED UP AND IDLE—IS THE WORD "CONSISTENCY" SIMPLY A WORD IN THE DICTIONARY?—ARE BRITISH SHIPS WET AND AMERICAN SHIPS DRY?

WASHINGTON, February.—The following has been contributed to the forthcoming issue of the Dearborn Independent by James Martin Miller:

"A notable meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce will be held in Rome, Italy, March 18 to 24 next. One hundred and fifty directors and officers of Chambers of Commerce and boards of commerce in the United States sailed from New York on February 10 aboard the Cunard steamship Coronia, cruising through to Egypt, Constantinople, etc., disembarking at Naples in time to reach Rome for the notable gathering. The delegates and other representatives of America's leading civic bodies come from the principal cities of the United States; identically the same ones that the National Marine Association induced to indorse the ship subsidy bill now before the United States Senate in a desperate effort to force it into law.

"Now, why did these American civic bodies that are said to be so anxious to have the American flag become the advance agent of American commerce throughout the world charter a British ship to carry them to a gathering where they will meet and deliberate with the very forces from every country of the world that hold, perhaps, more than any other class of men the commerce of the world in the palms of their hands? The United States has hundreds of ships, many of them the most magnificent the world has ever seen, and all these commercial representatives from the different countries of the world know we have them. What effect will this historic commercial pilgrimage, sent out by our most influential commercial bodies, have upon the foreign representatives of commerce in their respective countries as regards American commerce and shipping? Let the reader answer. Our British cousins must smile, likewise our Latin second cousins. Seems to us someone said Great Britain had a lobby in Washington working to the end of defeating the ship subsidy bill. If it is true, they certainly have made a 'killing' with the chambers of commerce and boards of commerce in the United States.

"What was our great Shipping Board doing with its high-powered men that they let such important and vital business get away from them? I asked an official of the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington, which is sending three or four delegates to Rome, under the British flag, to bolster up American commerce and shipping, why his organization and the same 150 other civic bodies, so anxious to have the ship subsidy bill passed, did not go to the Rome meet on an American ship. He replied that he, personally, as well as other members of the institution and some of those going from the different commercial bodies throughout the country, preferred to travel on a British ship.

"'Is it because the British ships are "wet"?' I pressed. His answer was amiable but vague.

"I then asked an official of the Shipping Board about the matter. He was a bit embarrassed, but, after a hesitation sentence, said: 'The Shipping Board did not have a ship available.'

"This, of course, is rank nonsense. Great Britain always has a ship available where there is any business. And this voyage of our great commercial representatives means far more than the money expended for the trip. They will pay the British ship about $325,000 to carry them.

"Can it be satisfactorily explained why these boosters of American commerce and of an American merchant marine will steam into Italy under a British flag instead of under the American flag? Mr. Webster's Dictionary contains a word we call 'consistency.' The time-honored proverb 'Consistency thou art a jewel,' should be revised to read, 'Applied consistence thou art a jewel.'"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 253.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), under the order previously entered, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 13, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 12, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who makest the morning and the evening to rejoice, lift upon us the light and the blessing of Thy holy countenance. Thou who are the light of life, illuminate the pathway that awaits us. When other voices tempt and other guides are false, keep us in the way of Thy truth. May we be proud to listen to human appeals and always magnanimous to serve their needs. O may we know how to use power. The God of the nations bless our country. We are touched with gratitude to-day as we get a glimpse of the past. On this his natal day, bless us with the spirit of him whose heart bore no guile, whose mind stored no prejudice, and who breathed upon all men heaven's blessing when he said: "With malice toward none and charity for all." When the shadow of the dusk descends, bring to our breasts the blessings of a day well spent. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 10, and of Sunday, February 11, 1923, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to present and request that the oath of office be administered to Mrs. MAE ELLA HUNT NOLAN, Representative elect from the fifth California district, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of her husband, Hon. John I. Nolan, who for nearly five terms so ably represented that district in Congress.

The SPEAKER. The certificate seems to be in proper form.

Mrs. NOLAN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law, the Members rising and applauding.

APPRENTICES IN THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I call up the conference report on the appropriation bill for the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up a conference report, and that has preference.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman allow me to submit a request for unanimous consent? It will take but a moment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the letter which the Public Printer has sent to the membership this morning, approving the Senate amendment which is embraced in the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, February 10, 1923.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The legislative appropriation bill (p. 35) contains a Senate amendment authorizing the Public Printer to employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the Government Printing Office. A motion is pending in the House for concurrence in this amendment. It has my hearty approval.

The Senate amendment has also been unanimously approved by the House and Senate Committees on Printing and the Joint Committee on Printing. The employment of apprentices in the Government Printing Office has likewise been indorsed by the first vice president of the International Typographical Union, Mr. Charles P. Howard, and by the United Typothetæ of America, an organization of the foremost employing printers in the United States. At a hearing before the House Committee on Printing on January 22, 1923, Mr. Howard said:

"There is no desire on my part to indicate that there is any opposition to an increased number of apprentices in the Government Printing Office if the Congress should see fit to change the regulations. I might add that the proper training of apprentices is a subject in which we are intensely interested and in which we are spending a great many thousands of dollars every year."

Under a law enacted in 1895, when the Government Printing Office was a comparatively small establishment, the number of apprentices was restricted to 25 at any one time. This limitation stopped the training of apprentices in the Government Printing Office until last July. The system was then revived and is now in successful operation as far as possible within the limit as to the number of apprentices fixed by the old law.

Chiefly for the purpose of making the world's greatest printing plant available for the proper training of disabled veterans of the World War, it is proposed to remove the restriction as to number of apprentices. There is no intention to train more apprentices than the work of the office will justify, but in order that the Government Printing Office may be able to secure at all times an adequate number of thoroughly qualified workmen and to open the way for this great establishment to do its full share in the vocational rehabilitation of disabled veterans, it is earnestly urged that the Senate amendment be enacted into law.

Inclosed is an extract from my report as Public Printer presenting in detail the reasons for a restoration of the apprenticeship system in the Government Printing Office. I would greatly appreciate your support in this worth-while endeavor, which now depends for its permanent success upon the authorization asked of Congress in Senate amendment No. 26 to the legislative appropriation bill. This will be acted upon by the House probably Monday or Tuesday.

Sincerely yours,
GEORGE H. CARTER,
Public Printer.

TRAINING OF APPRENTICES IN THE GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

[Extract from Annual Report of the Public Printer for 1922.]

In accordance with the plans outlined in the report for 1921, preparations were completed during the year for the training of apprentices in the Government Printing Office. Adequate courses were carefully prepared for the instruction of apprentices to qualify them as printers, pressmen, bookbinders, electrotypers, stereotypers, and machinists, each course covering a period of four years of intensive study and work. All the apprentices were appointed through civil-service examination, and the commission cooperated in every way possible to make a success of these examinations, which were held throughout the country on a given date. One hundred and sixty-two boys took the examinations, and out of these, 118 qualified for appointment.

Twenty of the number taking the examination were messenger boys in the Government Printing Office who had become inspired by their close association with the work of this office to learn a useful trade. The Civil Service Commission generously permitted the messenger boys to take a noncompetitive examination so that they might be appointed on passing, without regard to their relative rating. This provides a suitable stepping-stone for any ambitious messenger boy who desires to better his condition, and is especially advantageous to the Government in making available for apprentice training a group of boys who already have considerable knowledge of the trade they may elect to follow. Another very helpful action on the part of the Civil Service Commission was its agreement that apprentices, on satisfactorily completing their four years' training, could be appointed as journeymen in their respective trades without further civil-service examination.

The printing act of 1895 unfortunately restricts the number of apprentices that may be appointed in the Government Printing Office to not to exceed 25 at any one time. This law was enacted when there were only a few hundred journeymen in the Government Printing Office, as compared with more than 1,500 to-day. Even under union rules, the office now would be entitled to approximately 200 apprentices. As a matter of fact, however, no apprentices had been trained in the Government Printing Office for more than 35 years. The last of the few apprentices trained in this office are now retiring on account of age, after having proven themselves to be among the best and most faithful workmen ever employed in the Government Printing Office.

Not only on account of the shortage of labor in various crafts, but also to obtain employees properly trained in the special requirements of the Government service, is it highly essential that the Government Printing Office resume at this time the work of training many of its own skilled workers and continue without let or hindrance this most important duty to itself and to the printing industry of the United States.

On the recommendation of the Public Printer, the Civil Service Commission has agreed that any person entitled to preference because of military or naval service may be appointed an apprentice without regard to the 20-year maximum age limit. This will afford an opportunity for the rehabilitation training of many war veterans if the restriction to 25 apprentices now imposed by law is removed without further delay.

It is most urgently recommended, therefore, that the apprentice limitation be repealed by Congress at the present session, so that the Government Printing Office can begin at once more extensive training of veterans who may desire to earn a good and comfortable livelihood as thoroughly competent craftsmen.

As the Government Printing Office is unquestionably the best-equipped and most suitable place in the United States for training in the various branches of the allied printing trades, it is regrettable that this wonderful opportunity is now denied by law to all but a few of the young men who so heroically offered their lives in defense of the Nation which maintains this big establishment. Their training can be carried on without the expenditure of a single additional dollar save for the compensation of the veterans who desire better to fit themselves for the continued service of their country. If for no other reason, the vocational training of disabled veterans alone will fully justify the extension of the apprenticeship system to meet their special needs.

In this connection it should be stated that the Public Printer is already cooperating with the Veterans' Bureau in every way possible under the present law to train such disabled veterans as may be placed in the Government Printing Office for vocational instruction. Several trainees are now learning trades in this office. Expressing his appreciation of the interest which the Government Printing Office has taken in the adequate training of disabled veterans, the assistant director of the rehabilitation division of the Veterans' Bureau recently wrote the Public Printer as follows:

"* * * It is such practical cooperation as extended by you in this instance that encourages the bureau in its very difficult task of restoring to active and useful service such veterans as were disabled in defense of their country, and assists materially the plans of a grateful public and Government to restore such disabled veterans to their former capacity as useful citizens."

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up a conference report on the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota had moved to concur in a Senate amendment with an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 26: Page 35, after line 18, insert:

"The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office."

Mr. ANDERSON moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 26 with the following amendment. In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following:

"The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices, not to exceed 200 at any one time, as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] had made a preferential motion that the House recede and concur.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in order that the membership of the House may be advised as to just what the situation is, I should like to say that the Senate adopted an amendment to the bill making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government, as follows:

The Public Printer may hereafter employ such number of apprentices as in his judgment will be consistent with the economical service of the office.

Under existing law the number of apprentices in the Government Printing Office is limited to 25. So far as I know, there is no objection on the part of anyone to increasing the number of apprentices in the Government Printing Office. There are two fundamental reasons why this is desirable: First, because it will give the Public Printer an opportunity to bring into the service a number of young men who can be trained in the trades that are practiced in the Government Printing Office; second, because it will give the Public Printer an opportunity to cooperate with the vocational-training service in the interest of veterans of the Great War.

The only question involved in the two propositions now pending is whether the authority of the Government Printing Office to appoint apprentices should be unlimited, as is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], or whether the number of these apprentices shall be limited to 200, as proposed by the amendment which I have offered.

Under the existing rules the number of apprentices employed in commercial establishments is limited by agreements between the employers and the employees. Mr. Carter, the Public Printer, in his testimony before the subcommittee in charge of this bill, stated that if 200 apprentices were allowed in the Government Printing Office that number would conform substantially to the number permitted in commercial establishments. I do not see any reason why the power to appoint an unlimited number of apprentices should be granted to the Public Printer. On the contrary, it seems to me only desirable that the power to appoint apprentices in the Government Printing Office should be limited as is proposed by my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman understands that in the Government Printing Office there are three great trades—pressmen, binders, and printers, thousands of employees in all—working along with the extremely small number of 25 apprentices. The House Committee on Printing, the Senate Committee on Printing, and finally the Joint Committee on Printing all met and agreed that the plan proposed in the Senate amendment was the preferential plan. It may be that the best we can do is to limit the number to 200, and, if so, that will be a step in the right direction. As I understand it, it is not proposed that the number of apprentices shall be out of proportion to the number of skilled men in the trade any more than it would be in any other trade. The Joint Committee on Printing, unless restricted by actual legislation, will have the final control.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course it is true that the number of apprentices who could be employed is largely limited by the circumstances surrounding the operation of the Printing Office itself; but the fact still remains that the 200 provided in my amendment is substantially the number permitted in commercial establishments, and I do not see any reason why an unlimited number should be permitted. Unquestionably such an authority might be subject to abuse. I can see no possible harm that can come from limiting the number.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is no other class of employees who are limited. The only limitation is that he shall not at any time employ more hands than the absolute necessities of the public work may require, and upon that the power of the Joint Committee on Printing limits it to what is economically necessary. In other words, the matter is committed to the Joint Committee on Printing. When there is no limitation placed on other classes, why place it on this one particular class? There is no charge of abuse by the Joint Committee on Printing or the Public Printer.

Mr. ANDERSON. It has always been the practice of Congress to fix the number. I do not see any good that can come from departing from that policy, especially in view of the fact that the necessary requirements can be met.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. This matter was fully discussed on Saturday.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, if we can not have questions answered we had better go to something else.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-one Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question comes, first, on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment and concur therein.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks for a division of the question. The first question is on the motion to recede.

The motion to recede was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that after recession by the House the motion to concur is still preferential, and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS] would be a preferential motion, because that disposes of the whole question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably it has been held that way; the motion to recede and concur is divisible, and when divided the motion to recede and concur with an amendment takes precedence over a motion to recede and concur.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that while originally the motion to recede and concur has precedence, yet after the question has been divided and the House has decided to recede, then the motion to recede and concur with an amendment has preference. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that the House recede and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 126 ayes and 22 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and make that point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a quorum present; some gentlemen did not vote on either side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not sure and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty Members present. The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, to be placed in the rear of the RECORD, by inserting therein the legislative history of certain constitutional amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEFINING CROP FAILURE IN PRODUCTION OF WHEAT, ETC.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 38, respecting the definition of crop failures in wheat, rye, and oats.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 38, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 38.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes, to correct an error therein.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, at the time this resolution was under consideration the minority floor leader called my attention to what he believed was a mistake in the bill. The bill was sent to one department, which reported that that department thought the bill was all right. It is now apparent that there will be a difference between the departments unless the error be corrected, and I ask that the resolution be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

USE OF PUBLIC PARKS, ETC., FOR SHRINE CONVENTION.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes.

Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the resolution be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, and pending that asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 418, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the joint resolution be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that where it has been agreed in the House that general debate shall be dispensed with the bill is then read under the five-minute rule in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having ordered dispensing with general debate on the resolution, the Chair will instruct the Clerk to read the resolution for amendments under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized to loan to the said committee such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., belonging to the United States (battle flags excepted) as are not then in use, and may be suitable and proper for decorations and other purposes, which may be spared without detriment to the public service, such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., to be used by the committee under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by the said Secretaries, or either of them: Provided, That the said committee shall, within five days after the close of said session, return to the said Secretaries all such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., thus loaned; and said committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage not necessarily incident to such use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Has the Congress ever heretofore granted the use of bunting, flags, and the like to any private association for display purposes, as provided in this resolution? We have heretofore granted the use of tents for convention purposes outside of the District. This resolution is rather broad, permitting the Secretary of War to grant the use of flags and bunting, other than battle flags, ensigns, and decorations. The only liability upon the part of the host, the Almas Temple, is that they shall be liable for loss or damages not incidental to their use. Nearly everyone knows that when bunting and flags are used and rain comes they are not of much use thereafter.

If the Government is in possession of bunting and flags, why should not this private association indemnify the Government for their use?

Mr. FOCHT. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is full and ample provision made in the resolution for replacement and indemnification. On page 3 in line 4 the gentleman will find that the Shrine committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage to tents, and so forth.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not answer my question. I am inquiring why this association should not be liable for the damage incident to the use of bunting and flags.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman mean the wear and tear? What kind of damage does the gentleman have in mind?

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the War Department has possession of a considerable number of flags and bunting.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; stored away.

Mr. STAFFORD. We all realize that when they are exposed to the elements they are of little use thereafter.

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, no; it is the best thing in the world for them to be exposed, to get them out of storage, and have the moths shaken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. I challenge that statement, because the War Department in the preservation of its reserve stock does not have any loss by reason of moths. That is the case with woolens and all other clothing material. I know from observation that when flags and bunting are used and rain comes they are of little use thereafter. This bill does not indemnify the Government for that loss.

Mr. FOCHT. It clearly says that the Shrine committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage to such tents. What kind of English does the gentleman want to convince him that they are held to liability?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us take section 3 and see whether I am talking by the card. Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to loan the said committee such ensigns, flags, decorations, and so forth, as are not then in use and may be suitable for the purpose, and then their responsibility is described as follows:

Provided, That the said committee shall, within five days after the close of said session, return to the said Secretaries all such ensigns, flags, * * * and * * * shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damages not necessarily incident to their use.

The pertinency of my inquiry from the start has been to inquire why you should not hold them liable for the damages that may result from the use of them in case of storm. When flags and bunting are used after a rain they are not of much further use.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Would it remove the objection of the gentleman if we struck out the words "not necessarily incident to such use"?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on this first amendment I rise in opposition.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in June—probably all the Members do not know—500,000 Shriner delegates from every part of the United States will be here in Washington in a conclave. It is estimated that they will spend in Washington at least $100 apiece. That is $5,000,000 they will spend here. It is impossible to find hotel rooms or rooms in private homes for 500,000 strangers here in this city in one body. It is estimated that probably 100,000 of them will camp down here in the tourist camp ground in their automobiles. It is estimated there will be at least 100,000 more who will be camping on the various railroad sidetracks in Pullman cars, having their Pullman cars chartered for the trip. The other 300,000 will try to find rooms in hotels, boarding houses, and in private homes. Now, this resolution is merely to try to take care of them and furnish them with the ordinary courtesies that any city in the United States would arrange for such a splendid body of men. There is not one of them but who occupies the highest standing in the community from which he comes as a leading citizen, as a moral, upright man of responsibility in his community. My friend from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] knows that this is just as little as we can offer these men by this resolution. I do not think we ought to amend it. I do not think we ought to adopt the amendment which my friend from Wisconsin is trying to force out of my friend from Maryland. It is not necessary. Very naturally there is some little damage incident to the use of anything, but we ought not to place it upon the War Department to require the payment to this Government of some imaginary damage, and these men ought not to be held responsible for that when they come here to their Nation's Capital, and I hope the gentleman will not offer that amendment and that we adopt this resolution without amendment, just like it was brought in here.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4235. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Charlie Bridge Co. for construction of a bridge across Red River between Clay County, Tex., and Cotton County, Okla.;

S. 4522. An act authorizing the Secretary of State to convey certain land owned by the United States in Santiago, Chile, to the municipality of that city, and to acquire or receive in exchange therefor other land located in the said city;

S. 4503. An act granting the consent of Congress to Bethlehem Steel Co. to construct a bridge across Humphreys Creek at or near the city of Sparrows Point, Md.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 7583. An act for the relief of Henry Peters;

H. R. 10529. An act for the relief of Harry E. Fiske;

H. R. 13760. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River in the State of Massachusetts," approved November 14, 1921; and

H. R. 369. An act for the relief of the owner of Old Dominion Pier A.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

S. Res. 436. Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY Z. OSBORNE, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

USE OF PUBLIC PARKS, ETC., FOR SHRINE CONVENTION.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to loan to the said committee such tents, camp appliances, and other necessities, hospital furniture and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the United States, as in their judgment may be spared at the time of the session: Provided, That the said Shrine committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage to such tents, appliances, etc., as aforesaid, not necessarily incident to such use: And provided further, That the said committee shall give approved bond to do the same.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee where he gets authority to loan Red Cross flags and poles?

Mr. FOCHT. The Government has furnished the Red Cross with these flags and poles.

Mr. HULL. They belong to the Red Cross.

Mr. FOCHT. No; they do not; the Government loaned them to the Red Cross. It has been generous with the Red Cross and with other institutions in order to inspire enthusiasm and patriotism and I am surprised there is any question about this matter at all.

Mr. HULL. Well, I am not haggling at all.

Mr. FOCHT. That is what this seems to be.

Mr. HULL. But I simply want to inquire where the authority comes for loaning Red Cross flags by the Secretary of War?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. If the gentleman will read the bill it says, "belonging to the United States." We are not loaning something that does not belong to the United States. The gentleman will find on line 2, page 3, it says, "Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the United States." So we are not trying to loan something the Government does not own. If it did not own them it could not loan them.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. When the Rock Island Arsenal visits Washington we will extend the same courtesy to all its members.

Mr. HULL. Well, I am not going to object to anything in this resolution, but, in my opinion, you are setting some very dangerous precedents here in regard to loaning Government property. The Committee on Military Affairs is continuously confronted with the same reasons for the loan of Government property which you are granting here. Now, if you are going to loan Government property on an occasion like this for the city of Washington, the question comes up, naturally, Why should you not do the same thing when Atlanta has something, or New Orleans has something, or San Francisco has something? and every one of you Congressmen will be asked by those cities to obtain the same as in this case. I call attention to the fact right here. You would not pass this resolution for any other city in the country, but you are passing it here for the city of Washington. I am not going to object, but I call attention to the fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 6, page 3, the clause "not necessarily incident to such use."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 6, after the word "aforesaid," strike out the words "not necessarily incident to such use."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the chairman of the committee wishes to accept that amendment or not——

Mr. FOCHT. The author of the resolution is present and he can speak for himself, but I understand he does not want to accept any amendment whatever.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any harm in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. BLANTON. You do not want to accept that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should think it ill becomes a member of the committee or any Member of the House to charge any Member of this House with "haggling" when he is seeking to protect the interest of the Government. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is well within his rights in calling it to the attention of the Members of the House that this is the first time that we have ever authorized the use of equipage and flags and poles to any convention. The extent to which the Committee on Military Affairs has gone whenever it has been called upon to authorize the loan of these things from the War Department has been merely the utilization of tents. We have not even allowed the use of bedding and mattresses in the possession of the War Department. There is no difference between this function being held in the District of Columbia or out in San Francisco or any other part of the country where there are large stores of Army reserve supplies. We should at least protect the interests of the Government when you are seeking to go to this extent and proposing to furnish everything, I might say—ambulances, drivers, and stretchers—and provide that if there is any damage incidental to the use of those things it should be repaired.

Particularly do I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that when bunting and flags are concerned what right have we, although the Government has in its possession large quantities of flags and bunting, to allow those article to be used for this private demonstration without indemnification on the part of the persons who use it? We have never done it heretofore in the case of inaugurations. I know the spirit that animates Members here is to be liberal. I want to be liberal, but I think we should particularly safeguard the interests of the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman is unduly exercised about this matter. There is no doubt but that there are coming to this city bodies of men such as never came here before. There are probably 100,000 people of the country coming to this town, representing every locality in the Union, and there is no reason why the Government should not loan these things to those men who are part of the whole people coming from all parts of the country. I have read this bill carefully; I knew something of it some time ago. I believe it should be passed just as it is without a change in it. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. You are seeking here to loan materials that we have never loaned to others under similar circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. I will yield some of it to others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the remark of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], that there was no attempt on my part, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], to offer a rebuke to the gentleman from Iowa. What he says is absolutely correct. But a precedent was also set when we loaned the Liberty Bell to be sent across the continent to inspire the minds of the youth of the country. On that occasion we did not demand an indemnification for any injuries that might be entailed. Let us give consideration to each such precedent and determine it on its own merits. But allow me to say that this organization is well able to make good any indemnifying proposition that may be submitted to it. The author of the resolution is ready to accept any amendment intended to safeguard the property of the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. You can not move the previous question.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to show my colleagues the legal effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. If you adopt his amendment you make it obligatory on the War Department to charge these Shriners for the value of the use of this property—the rental value. That is exactly what his amendment means, legally. You are to make them pay damages for the use of this property, not excluding the ordinary damage incidental to its use. Whenever you strike out this language, "not necessarily incident to such use," that the gentleman asks you to strike out, you require the War Department to charge them for something that Congress does not intend that they shall be charged for. The chairman of the District Committee, when it is in session over there in his office, absolutely controls the committee, but he can not now speak for the committee in accepting this amendment. When he tells the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that he accepts it, he is speaking for one man, and one only.

Mr. FOCHT. Who are you speaking for?

Mr. BLANTON. For another man; and that other man has as much right to speak as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, especially as the "other man" will be here after the gentleman from Pennsylvania goes home. [Laughter.]

Let me call attention to what this proposition embraces. Do you know that every one of these 500,000 citizens of the United States who are coming here in June, every one of them, is either a Knight Templar Mason or he is a Thirty-second Scottish Rite Mason? You gentlemen know what that means in a community. It is the result of having lived a life of morality, and sobriety, and good citizenship for years. It is the result of having so conducted himself in his home community in such a way that he has the confidence and the respect of his home citizens. It is 500,000 of the leading citizens of this Nation who are coming here in June, and I do not think that we ought to place any such burden upon them or restrictions around them.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPROUL. I want to say to the gentleman that there are nearly 50,000 Shriners coming from the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. BLANTON. That just emphasizes the argument I am making. I do not want to take up any more time, because my friend from California [Mr. MACLAFFERTY] is just dying to say something, and I yield to him.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have almost imagined, as I have been sitting here, that I was in the Scotch Parliament instead of the American Congress. I am surprised that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] says that the Shrine coming to Washington, the home city of this Nation, the city that belongs to the people of the United States of America, is the same as if they went to San Francisco or New Orleans. I will tell you that I was at San Francisco when the Imperial Council of the Shrine was held there last year, and the city of San Francisco gave them everything they possessed to make that show a success. We boasted in San Francisco that we had 84 temples, and 129 temples have registered as intending to come here. Now, for God's sake, gentlemen, these men, when they come here, are to be the guests of our Nation. Let us put out the bunting, let us put out all the flags, let us make all the joy we can in this city. Every American ought once in his life to visit the city of Washington, the home of his National Government; and let us, if we can, strike every word out of the RECORD this morning that indicates that we have tried to deal with the Shriners in a close or parsimonious manner. Let us throw the door open and say, "Come in. You may be good Americans when you come, but when you go back you will be better Americans than you were before." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized to permit the use of any or all public parks, reservations, or other public spaces in the District of Columbia for use by said committee for parking automobiles, the temporary erection of tents for entertainments, hospitals, and other purposes; and said committee is hereby authorized to charge reasonable fees for entertainment and accommodations on said parks, reservations, or other public spaces to aid in meeting the necessary expenses incident to the session.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the meaning of the provision in lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 on page 4, that said committee is hereby authorized to charge reasonable fees for enteratinment and accommodations on said parks, reservations, or other public spaces to aid in meeting the necessary expenses incident to the session? As I understand it, that will permit the local committee here, who naturally will be anxious to recoup all the advances they have made for the purposes of getting this convention here, to charge fees for entertainments on public property. Does not the gentleman think he ought to have somebody approve these fees besides the committee, that is selfishly interested in getting a large return? I do not suppose the committee would be moved by any other consideration than would move any local committee. It occurs to me that if you are going to give them the use of the public parks for the benefit of these men, somebody besides the committee themselves ought to have some say-so about the amount of the fees that are going to be charged for the entertainments and concessions on these grounds.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman will allow me, while the charge made may be a little more than the actual expenses of caretaking, it is designed to protect the property that will be left there during the time the conclave is in session. The grounds must be policed and the property cared for in several different ways, and that expense has to be met. Let me call your attention to this fact: Last year at San Francisco the committee raised over $400,000 for the entertainment of this Imperial Council. They expended quite a bit over $300,000 and returned the remainder pro rata to the subscribers; but it cost them over $300,000 to carry on the Imperial Council. It may cost more than that here for the entertainment of the Imperial Council in Washington, because holding the conclave in the National Capital will attract people to the convention who possibly would not attend in any other city.

Mr. MACLAFFERTY. It is a center of population, too.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not get my point.

Mr. IRELAND. I will get to it in a moment. They have not the money; they can not call upon the residents of the District in the same way that they might in some other city, and they must have some slight means of raising funds.

Mr. WINGO. From the selfish money-making standpoint, why is not the bringing of this great crowd here just as valuable to the merchants of the city of Washington as it would be to the merchants of any other city of the same size?

Mr. IRELAND. I presume that may be true in a degree, and that is the only point of selfishness that may enter into it in any way. I do not think the merchants of Washington are especially interested——

Mr. WINGO. I am not charging them with any undue selfishness. Do not let that impression be created.

Mr. IRELAND. I understand that.

Mr. WINGO. But here is the point which the gentleman does not seem to catch. I am willing to have them charge a reasonable fee. It is very proper to have a reasonable fee for the entertainment and accommodations furnished upon these public parks; but I think the gentlemen who are anxious to recoup what they pay out should not be permitted to determine what the amount of the fee shall be, prejudiced as they are, as you and I would be, to charge what they think the public will stand in order to recoup what they pay out. The language of the bill provides that it is not simply to meet the expenses that the gentleman refers to but to meet the necessary expenses incident to the session.

Mr. IRELAND. Even so, the possibility of recoupment is so very remote they could not possibly receive in revenues any appreciable fraction of the amount necessary to be expended.

Mr. WINGO. What is the objection to having these fees approved by the commissioners?

Mr. IRELAND. I do not know that there would be any serious objection to that.

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. IRELAND. I am positive that Almas Temple would not in any way want to abuse any privilege accorded.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think Almas Temple would.

Mr. IRELAND. They are the hosts. They do not want in any way to seem inhospitable to any of their guests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. All the members of this committee that will have anything whatever to do with fixing the fees or making the charge will be Shriners in whom every one of these 500,000 men who are coming here will have absolute confidence, and every one of them will approve of their action even before he knows what it is; they all have such confidence in them.

We did this very same thing for the disabled ex-service men when they had a circus down near the depot; we gave them the free use of the lot for their circus. There will be certain Shriners' entertainments, and it will be the Shriners who will pay, and they will pay whatever the committee charges readily and willingly.

Mr. WINGO. Gentlemen think that I am trying to attribute to these men elements that are not common to the human family. I am a thirty-second degree Mason myself, but that does not make me so altruistic that I might sit on a jury in which I had an interest in property rights that were involved. I do not know; the gentleman may be a good Shriner, but he is no better Mason than I am. The proposition is that somebody who has not a selfish interest ought to pass on the reasonableness of these fees. I have been on entertainment committees myself. I think it would be a better protection to the committee if you had officials to approve the reasonableness of the fees.

Mr. IRELAND. Let me give one instance of unselfishness. The Almas Temple has voted to devote every cent they have in the treasury to this matter. The Almas Temple when they get through will be absolutely broke. They voted every cent it possesses.

Mr. WINGO. I have great confidence in the judgment of my friend. I am not going to offer an amendment, but I know the members of this temple and I know that they would thank the Lord if they had somebody to approve of these fees, so that they would not be cussed. There will not be, I fear, a State in the Union that you will not have some members kicking at the boys here when there ought to be some official to share the responsibility.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that it be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 418 authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider that vote and lay that motion on the table.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker; there is no necessity for it.

BOARD OF ACCOUNTANCY FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate be dispensed with.

Mr. BLANTON. Let us hear what the bill is.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to dispense with general debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2531.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to bring up the school teachers' bill to-day?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. We have a number of bills that we are to bring up first.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not intend to pass the school teachers' bill to-day?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would like to pass it if we can.

Mr. WINGO. Is there any hope of reaching it to-day?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I can not say; I am trying to expedite matters as much as possible.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that there is no chance in the world, because I believe that bill has been sandbagged.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count.

Mr. HERRICK. I will withdraw that for the time being.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be no controversy about this bill. It does not appropriate a single dollar out of the Federal Treasury. It simply gives the certified public accountants the same protection that they enjoy in all 48 States in the Union. It has the indorsement of the American Society of Certified Public Accountants, and is presented here owing to the fact that there was no protection at the present time for those who have expended time and money in obtaining the technical education as a certified public accountant here in the District.

An organization has been issuing certificates here and certifying public accountants to anyone who would pay a fee of $15, and recently the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia issued an injunction enjoining the furnishing or issuing of such certificate.

The expenses of the board here created are paid entirely out of the fees collected by them, and any remaining surplus is paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia.

I do not know of any matter in controversy in the bill, and I will be glad to answer any questions in reference to it that I am able to answer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I remember reading about some voluntary board of accountancy here in the District being enjoined from furnishing certificates outside of the District. Can the gentleman give any information as to whether a voluntary association here has been furnishing certificates to authorize the performance of accountancy work in the States outside?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Each State regulates its reciprocal relationship with other States and with the District of Columbia as to accountancy. The testimony before our committee was that an association here calling itself a board had been issuing certificates for certified public accountants upon the payment of a fee of $10, and we had before us a letter showing that in some cases they had issued certificates to persons who were not proficient in the art or profession of accountancy, with the proviso that those people should apply themselves and fit themselves, notwithstanding the fact that they had already received their certificates. That association has been enjoined from issuing these certificates.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is very likely that that is the association whose practices were condemned outside of the District. People were seeking to use these certificates to permit them to work in other States. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] states that suits were brought in 10 other States to restrain the practices of this fake commission.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That would not be possible if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. If I understand it, the District of Columbia is the only place in the United States that has no law regulating public accountants.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is correct. All of the 48 States of the Union have this protection for their certified public accountants.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be a board of accountancy. No man will deny the good policy of having a law which would require certain qualifications of men who act as public accountants. That is not the question that I now have in mind. The main question that I object to concerning this bill is that it will again delegate to others the power of Congress to fix salaries.

We permit the people of the District of Columbia, 437,000 of them, to have no voice whatever in the management of their own public business. We do not let them select their commissioners. We have their commissioners appointed for them. The commissioners suit a few of the people, but the great mass of the people of the District they do not suit. We let the members of the school board, the board of education, be appointed for the people. We do not let the people select their own school board, but that board is selected under orders of Congress.

That board pleases some of the people, but most of the people it does not please. So with the Board of Public Utilities. We provide a method for their selection, concerning which the people of the District, whom they serve, have no voice whatever. That commission is selected under provisions authorized by Congress for the people, not by the people. The action of the Board of Public Utilities pleases a very few of the people of the District, but the most of the people of the District it does not please.

Because I have contended for one thing concerning the District I have been heralded publicly as the enemy of the District. I am not the enemy of the District. I am as good a friend of this Nation's Capital as any man in the House or any Member of Congress. There has just been one fundamental proposition that I have contended for here on the floor of the House which has caused me to be placed in the category of those who are not in favor of the District, and that is fair taxation upon the people. I have contended here that $1.30 on the hundred which is charged the people of the District is not fair taxation, when all of the balance of the expense of their civic improvement and their civic government is paid for by the whole people of the United States. This Board of Accountancy that we are giving the people of the District is one of the so-called recompenses that we make to the District people for not giving them any voice in their government. It is another of the recompenses that we make to the people of the District when they are given this low rate of taxation. It is not a proper recompense, however, to the whole people. It does not recompense the people of the United States.

If we will place anything like the taxation on the 437,000 people who live here in the District that our own people at home pay, you will never find me opposing a single bill that is designed for the interest of the District. Is not that a reasonable proposition? Is there any excuse for not accepting that one proposition? Why should the people who live in the city of Washington—the most beautiful city in the world, and if not that the most beautiful in the United States—not pay something like the taxes our home people pay? Why should they get all of the civic benefits, conveniences, and improvements here and pay only $1.30 on the hundred? That is the total tax they pay. That is a question that sooner or later will have to be answered here on the floor of this House and in the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Then, that is based on a 60 per cent valuation, is it not?

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is presumed to be based on a 100 per cent valuation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Two-thirds is the testimony.

Mr. BLANTON. No; the gentleman is wrong about that, because I know what I am talking about. It is presumed to be based on a 100 per cent valuation, but it is not, when the property is rendered for taxation. Let me say to my friend that he probably noticed in the paper the other day, if he reads the papers as closely as I do, and I am sure that he does, that the property out here at 2400 Sixteenth Street, known to every Congressman—it is a kind of rendezvous for Congressmen and Senators——

Mr. WINGO. What?

Mr. BLANTON. They understand down in Texas what rendezvous means, and I am sure they do in Arkansas—that property was reported sold the other day for $2,500,000, so we are informed by the public press. Of course, I do not know myself what it sold for, but the public press is our only means of finding out things in some instances. If the press deceives us, that is not our fault. The newspapers of Washington—and it has not been denied—told us the other day that the property at 2400 Sixteenth Street sold for about $2,500,000. How much is it rendered for, for purposes of taxation?

I have been told it was less than $1,100,000 that this property is rendered for taxation. Is that full value? I noticed the press reported a building sold to a merchant about three months ago, and I noted the purchase price of the sale, and I caused an inquiry to be made to find out what that property was rendered for taxation, and it was rendered for only 48 per cent of what it sold for. Now, the presumption is that it was rendered at full value, but when you investigate you find that it is not. Go down and buy a home out here, one of these new homes on Irving Street, and pay $17,500 for it—that is what you will have to pay—and you go down here and see what that property is rendered for taxation, and you will find out that few of them are rendered for taxes for as much as $12,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. That has not been my experience. I bought a home the first year I was here for $8,000, and they got it rated $7,900 for taxes, and that is pretty close.

Mr. BLANTON. How long ago was that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Nineteen hundred and eighteen.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman bought in 1918 for $8,000?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And they are now rendering it for taxes at $7,900?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is rendered for taxation at $7,900.

Mr. BLANTON. That is about right if you want to get a rate of about 50 per cent, because the property which the gentleman bought back in 1918 for $8,000 is probably worth $16,000 now. Just take it all over the city, that is the fact; it has about doubled in price.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the gentleman wants to buy it at that figure, I will be glad to make a trade.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will not sell at $8,000, will he?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will sell mighty close to it.

Mr. BLANTON. How much? We might make a deal.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I am not going to say; but if the gentleman wants to buy it at $16,000, he can get it.

Mr. BLANTON. But he will not sell at anything like the figure it is rendered for taxation? I am just making this point: That the people here pay on a tax of $1.30 per $100, and our constituents at home pay all the balance of their expenses.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I agree with the gentleman that the people here ought to pay equal taxes. I have a good deal more property elsewhere than here, but——

Mr. BLANTON. Is there a single man here who does not agree with that? I would like to see who does not. Now, wait just a minute. I want to clinch the nail here. There is not a man here who disagrees to that proposition, because no one has evidenced opposition. Then why do we not do it? We sit here day after day and year after year and let these 437,000 people in the District of Columbia continue to pay $1.30 for taxes, when people elsewhere, in every other city, are paying at least 3 per cent, and because I think they also ought to pay a fair tax here I am heralded as an enemy to the people of this District. My name is rarely mentioned in the newspapers here except in a derogatory way because I stand up and fight for something that is right and for something which ought to be done by Congress.

Mr. STEVENSON. What I wanted to ask the gentleman and what has bothered me is, What is to be done with the enormous amount of Government property here that ought to be put on the tax books, which, if it paid taxes on the absolute value, it strikes me, we would not have to get anything out of the Treasury at all to run the District government at the present rate? What about that?

Mr. BLANTON. This Government property has caused Washington to grow from a village to a city of 437,000. Mr. CRAMTON, the gentleman from Michigan, of whom I am a great admirer, because I have watched him here in his hard work, and I am a great admirer of any gentleman who works, has a bill here which he introduced the other day to change this fiscal relation and make the Government pay only $8,000,000 toward the expenses of this city and the District people pay the balance of it. That is a step in the right direction, but it does not solve the question.

It is not proper that the whole people of the United States should be made to pay $8,000,000 expenses for District people, whose total taxes aggregate only $1.30 on the $100. Why do we not wake up some day and stop this foolishness, and say that the people of the District of Columbia shall pay 3 per cent tax and the Government pay the balance? That is as little as we can do and do justice to the whole people of the United States. I wonder if there is a single city of 10,000 people or more in the United States whose total taxes—State, county, municipal, and school—is under 3 per cent all told. I do not think there is a city in the United States where the tax is under 3 per cent, total tax. Why do not we wake up and say that there shall be 3 per cent tax here? I will tell you why, and I want to be frank with my colleagues. Everyone is choosing the path of least resistance on this question. You are willing to sit down and say nothing. Are you afraid of the newspapers who condemn me because I speak the facts? Are you afraid of that, or are you afraid of their putting cartoons in the paper about you?

That is the path of least resistance. Do you let that influence you? I am not afraid of it. I can stand it. The time is going to come when the people of the District, the big men who think, are going to go to these papers and say, "You let Congressmen alone when they are honest and sincere, when they are speaking their convictions; you let them alone and not abuse them as you are doing. They have the right to speak their sentiments about the District. You are merely making enemies for the District instead of friends." They have never made me an enemy, because I am broader minded than that. I can withstand criticisms. I am not punishing the people of the District because of the way the newspapers treat me, but I stand up and fearlessly speak for what the whole people ought to get.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I would like the gentleman to enlighten the House as to why we can not get up the teachers' pay bill; why we can not get it up to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not want to get me "in bad" with the committee, does he?

Mr. WINGO. No. I appreciate the amicable relations that exist between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] and the gentleman from Texas. But I would like to have some enlightenment as to when we shall be able to get the teachers' pay bill up.

Mr. BLANTON. I have so qualified and limited my remarks that I can still keep my feet under the table with the gentleman from Pennsylvania and sit with him at the various conferences we have on District business.

Mr. WINGO. How about what is on top of the table? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell you what I believe. I believe my good friend from Pennsylvania has sandbagged that bill, and I will tell you why. In the form in which that bill was brought into the committee, it took splendid care of the administrative officers of the school board. It raised their salaries to the limit, and the blue sky was the limit. The statutory salary of the president of that board is now $5,000. He had the Committee on Appropriations raise it to $6,000, but they did it without authority of law. His authorized statutory salary, I say, is only $5,000. When he prepared that teachers' pay bill he put his salary at $10,000, $2,500 more than a Senator at the other end of the Capitol gets, and the other administrative officers were all taken care of in the same proportion. Then I whittled on it in the committee, but succeeded in reducing it only to $7,500. When you came to the teaching teacher, the scientific teacher that actually teaches the children, the one who does the real work, the one who really forms the backbone of the educational system, you will find they were not properly taken care of at all, and if it had not been for the motions of my friend from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], seconded by myself, some of them would still be not properly taken care of. But Mr. ZIHLMAN, backed up by some of the rest of us on the committee, took care of those teaching teachers, and because the teachers asked us to do that they made these administrative officers mad, and to punish those teachers they said, "You let us run these legislative affairs. Keep your hands out. Now you have spoiled the broth, and the bill won't pass." If it had not been for the action taken by the teachers themselves, they would not have gotten any proper raises at all.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Are you in favor of the union?

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of these teachers, and approve of them coming to Congress for proper redress of their rights. So we took care of those teachers in the bill. We seem to have made those administrative officers mad.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman does an injustice to the chairman of the committee. The bill has been on the calendar since the 9th day of August. We hope to reach that bill. But as to this bill which is pending now, about which there is no controversy, the gentleman by his objection has thrown it into general debate.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman tell me how long the teachers bill has been before Congress?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It has been on the calendar ever since last August.

Mr. BLANTON. But for about three years it has been a mooted question before Congress, and we did not hear of this accountancy bill until just a short time ago.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It has been on the calendar since last August.

Mr. BLANTON. Did we not hold hearings in our committee only a short time ago?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They have not had any hearings on it. It is a Senate bill, on the calendar.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I am glad to hear that from the gentleman from Maryland. Do you not think we can pass this accountancy bill and then take up the teachers bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I gladly accept the statement of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] that he would take up the teachers' bill next.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a minute.

I am glad that the gentleman will take up the teachers' bill next, because it is one of the most important pieces of legislation that is before our committee. It ought not to be sidetracked here. It is true that there are some little things in there that ought to be changed. We ought to change it. But apparently something had sandbagged it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me suggest that if we all talk an hour or so we will get nowhere. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Minnesota can Coue some gentlemen, but he can not Coue me. [Laughter.]

I will agree to quit the floor now if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will promise to take up the school bill next.

Mr. FOCHT. We have it here.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman going to take it up to-day?

Mr. FOCHT. If you will get through talking or else talk to the question pending and help get some of these bills out of the way.

Mr. BLANTON. How many bills are ahead of it?

Mr. FOCHT. Three.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman says "three." The gentleman knows he can not pass those three bills to-day.

Mr. FOCHT. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Will you vote for this school bill? And if you will, when did you change your mind from what you said to me?

Mr. BLANTON. I am for the school bill, with a few minor changes. I am for every single feature of it that raises the teachers' salaries.

Mr. FOCHT. You are not for it except you want a teachers' bill in which the people of the District of Columbia will pay the whole expense.

Mr. BLANTON. That should be done. I am for the teachers part of it, too.

I am for the teachers' raises in the bill. I am against the administrative raises in it.

But let me get back to the bill under consideration. In this accountancy bill we are providing that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may fix the remuneration that this board of accountancy shall receive out of the fees that they charge. That is an improper delegation of authority from Congress to the commissioners, the delegation of a power that Congress itself ought to exercise. I am not going to vote to delegate the power of Congress to fix salaries to any commission any more as long as I am here on the floor of this House. I am going to meet by my vote the responsibility that is upon my shoulders as a Representative of the people in Congress, and when these salaries are fixed they should be fixed by our votes here and not by the vote of a delegated authority. Why should we not fix these salaries ourselves? Why should we leave that matter indeterminate? Why should we leave that matter undecided and open? Why should we let the commissioners do in the future something that we ought to do in this bill ourselves? I am not in favor of it. I am in favor of fixing now the remuneration that this board of accountancy shall receive and not leave it to the commissioners to decide in the future. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] will change that feature, if he will fix the reasonable remuneration so that we as Members of Congress will know what we are doing, then I will vote for this bill. Otherwise I am going to vote against it.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HAMMER. Does not the gentleman think we could pass this accountancy bill in five minutes if we would stop debating it?

Mr. BLANTON. There are a few other things I want to tell the gentleman.

Mr. HAMMER. It seems to me there is no necessity of debating all these questions of taxation and other things in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am through.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and six Members are present, a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of this act a public accountant is hereby defined as a person skilled in the knowledge and science of accounting, who holds himself out to the public as a practicing accountant for compensation, and who maintains an office for the transaction of business as such, whose time during the regular business hours of the day is devoted to the practice of accounting as a professional public accountant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it necessary for an accountant in the District of Columbia to maintain an office for the transaction of business, as this section provides?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. The section provides—for the purpose of this act a public accountant is hereby defined as a person skilled in the knowledge and science of accounting, who holds himself out to the public as a practicing accountant for compensation, and who maintains an office for the transaction of business as such, whose time during the regular business hours of the day is devoted to the practice of accounting as a professional public accountant.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Later in the act it defines those who do not maintain an office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought that the qualifications for accountancy were mental, and not physical.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think the gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I read this section some months ago I thought it was rather strange that you should require a person in order to be considered a public accountant to maintain an office for the transaction of business as such.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Anyone who comes here and who has not an office, who comes here to do some particular piece of work, will have a certificate as a certified public accountant from his own State. This is merely to license accountants in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the necessity of requiring that he maintain an office for the transaction of business?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Where do you want him to do business—on the street corner?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; that is not necessary. A man may be a professional man without having an office.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It provides later in the bill for certifying men who are employed by other firms. It is the common language used in all these cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the board of accountancy shall not grant a certificate as a certified public accountant to any person other than (a) a citizen of the United States, one who has duly declared his or her intention of becoming such citizen, who is over the age of 21 years; and (b) of good moral character; (c) who is a graduate of a high school with a four years' course or has had an equivalent education; and (d) who has received a diploma from some recognized school of accountancy and has had one year's experience in the employment of a practicing certified public accountant, or has had three years' experience in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant; and (e) except under the provisions of section 6 of this act, who shall have successfully passed examinations in the theory and practice of general accounting, in commercial law as affecting accountancy, and in such other related subjects as the board may deem advisable: Provided, That the board of accountancy may waive the provision for accounting experience as set forth in clause (d) above, and in lieu thereof may hold in abeyance a certificate to any person who shall otherwise have qualified until such time as the applicant can prove to have served two years in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant: Provided further, That the board may waive the requirement for service in the employ of a practicing certified public accountant, as set forth in clause (d) above, in the case of any person who has had not less than five years' actual and continuous experience in auditing the books and accounts of other persons in three or more distinct lines of commercial business, but nothing contained in this act shall be construed as granting any power to wave any provision of this act other than as set forth herein, nor shall any such waiver be granted except by the unanimous vote of the members of the board.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 3, line 15, after the word "education" insert "or who, in the opinion of the board, has had sufficient commercial experience in accounting."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the board of accountancy shall charge for the examinations, together with certificates to successful applicants, provided for in this act, a fee of $25. This fee shall be payable by the applicant at the time of making his or her initial application. Should the applicant fail to pass the required examination, subsequent examinations will be given the same applicant for an additional fee of $10 for each examination. From the fees collected under this act the board shall pay all expenses incident to the examinations, the expenses of issuing certificates, and traveling expenses of the members of the board while performing their duties under this act; and if any surplus remain on the 30th day of June of each year the members of the board shall be paid therefrom such reasonable compensation as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine: Provided, That no expenses incurred under this act shall be a charge against the funds of the United States nor the District of Columbia. The board shall annually report the number of certificates issued and the receipts and expenses under this act during each fiscal year to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

With the following committee amendments:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Page 6, line 25, after the word "determine," insert "and the remaining surplus, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that as amended the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill S. 2531 had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. HERRICK. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets to say that it is too late. The Chair has declared that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-six Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE ON DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported from the District of Columbia Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported by the District of Columbia Committee.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

EQUALIZE PENSIONS OF RETIRED POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3169), to equalize pensions of retired policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for recognition. Is there objection?

Mr. HERRICK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act all persons upon the pension rolls of the police and fire departments of the District of Columbia who were granted relief in accordance with laws enacted prior to December 5, 1919, shall receive such relief as is allowable under existing law, and all persons now or hereafter receiving relief from the policemen and firemen's relief fund shall also be entitled to all pension benefits resulting from any increase in pay that has or may hereafter be granted by Congress: Provided, That no arrears of pension shall be granted for any period prior to an application for an increase in pension under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That any widow entitled to relief from the policemen and firemen's relief fund may hereafter receive not more than $60 per month.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MADDEN having taken the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 440. Joint resolution to satisfy the award rendered against the United States by the arbitral tribunal established under the special agreement concluded June 30, 1921, between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Norway.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to Senate amendment No. 26 to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

EQUALIZE PENSIONS OF RETIRED POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to take time on a bill of this character, but I do not want the Members of the House to vote without full knowledge of the real contents and purpose of this bill. In 1916 a law was passed retiring firemen and policemen of the District of Columbia. A fund was created to which the Government contributed liberally, and 1½ per cent of the salary of these employees was converted into the fund. In 1919 the pay of the police and firemen in Washington was materially increased. The men who had been retired under the old pension act—50 per cent of their salary—were entirely satisfied with the conditions, but became dissatisfied immediately on the increase of salary of those who took their places, because those in the department now are retired on one-half of the salaries which were increased in 1919. Now, this bill seeks to equalize the pensions of these two classes of employees. It is absolutely wrong to my mind, because it is retroactive in its character. It would be just as reasonable for the members of the Washington police and fire departments who were retired previous to the establishment of any pension legislation whatever to come here and ask that they, too, be granted the privileges of retirement under the present retirement bill. If the pay of those at present employed in these two capacities in the city of Washington should again be raised 10 years from now, all the men who shall have joined the ranks of the pensioners would come forward with this as a precedent to ask that they, too, be retired under the new pension bill.

It is practically a retroactive increase of salary for those who were in the departments from 1916 to 1919 and have been retired on a pension.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report does not state at what age members of the police and fire departments are mandatorily retired. It states that under the existing law if they have reached the age of 55 years and have had not less than 25 years of service and are incapacitated, or have become permanently disabled so as to incapacitate them from further performance of duty, they are retired. What is the age at which they are retired compulsorily even though they are still fit to perform the duties of the respective services?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not tell the gentleman. I do not know that there is compulsory retirement.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think I can give the information. They can be retired at the age of 60, after 25 years of service, at the discretion of the commissioners; but if in the discretion of the commissioners they are fitted to perform the duties of a policeman or fireman, they can be continued under existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the average age of retirement of the policemen and firemen at the time they sever their connection with the service?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is pretty hard to answer, because many of these men are retired because of disability incurred in the service; so that the average age would not indicate anything. If a man is permanently injured as a fireman or a policeman he is retired, regardless of his age.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, he is retired if he receives an injury in the performance of his duties; but if he has reached the age of 55 years and has had 25 years of service, and is then incapacitated, he is retired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was trying to ascertain, because this is a matter which has been before the House off and on for many years past. I want to know whether the rule is that they are retired when they reach the age of 55 years?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; that is not the rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the rule as to whether they are retired as a matter of course when they reach 60?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They are not retired at the age of 60 unless they make a regular application and on examination the board of surgeons determines that the fireman or the policeman is no longer fitted for active duty. Many of the men in the service are past the age of 60 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts any information as to the condition of this fund at the present time?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think there is a sufficient amount in the fund to meet all of the demands on it for some time to come. But I want the members of the committee to give me their attention for just a moment. This retirement business has resulted in a very, very bad condition of affairs in the Government service. A man is retired upon application, and usually that is in control of some board which can find some excuse for retirement. He is retired at the age of 55 or 60 years. Does he retire on his pension? No. He goes out and gets another job from somebody else. He can afford to work cheaper than the ordinary individual, because he is drawing, in addition to what the job may pay, 50 per cent of a pretty good salary. I have had it brought to my attention only recently where a man in the customs service who had been retired from another branch of the Government service on a pension of $1,300 a year is now drawing from the Government $2,400 a year in addition to his pension.

As you visit various banks you find a watchman or messenger, or perhaps you may call him a sort of host, and you will find that nine times out of ten men occupying that position are retired Government employees holding down this extra job. Of course that has nothing to do with this bill, except that the more you increase pensions the more injustice is done to the man in the street, the ordinary, everyday average citizen, the carpenter, the bricklayer, the minister, the lawyer, the doctor, the stenographers, typewriters, and the laborer in hundreds of trades and occupations who work for a living, and when they become 55 or 60 years of age they have to look out for themselves, with the little they have saved, and in addition pay taxes to take care of these pensioners. That is unjust, and unless Congress is ready to adopt an old-age pension scheme, and commit itself to a general pension for all citizens, we should pass legislation regarding special pensions with a great deal of care.

It has become a custom to pension public employees, but that does not make it right. These favored individuals who are retired with pay have had steady jobs; they have received their pay regularly; they have had 30 days' vacation, and if they are sick they are paid for the time that they lose. They are pensioned at 50, 55, or 60 years of age, when 90 per cent of our people have to retire at that age or perhaps a little older and pay, in addition to their own expenses, a contribution for these pensions. It is not right, after we make a law once, very liberal in its provisions, that because somebody else subsequently gets a little more salary for those already retired to come before Congress and state that they ought to have an increase in their pension. Of course many of them are not retired because they want to be, but because they have been injured in the service. They have my sympathy, but undoubtedly they have enough to take care of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what the 50 per cent is that they are now receiving? I refer to those retired before we increased the salary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The salary, as I understand, and I may not have the figures right, before they were retired was $1,800 a year, and the increase has been to $2,400.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh! I question very much whether patrolmen or firemen received $1,800 a year at the time of their retirement.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There is not a man who receives more than $65 a month, and many of them receive as low as $12.50 a month—those who would be benefited by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. How can they receive so low an amount as $12.50 a month? That certainly is not 50 per cent of the pay they received at the time of retirement.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will give you the names as given to me. A. M. Carter, who is a fire pensioner. He receives $12.50 a month, I am advised by the District auditor's office.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, they receive 50 per cent of the pay at the time of retirement?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any fireman employed in the District of Columbia at a salary of $300 or $400 a year?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The figures are furnished me and the men named and the rate received——

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is part of the relief fund. That is, there will be so much for partial disability, and they are allowed so much for sickness. That is not a pension they are receiving. I think the lowest pension is about $900 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am trying to find out what is the difference in the rate of pay per year they are now receiving and what they will receive under this bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am trying——

Mr. UNDERHILL. As to the accuracy of the statement furnished by the gentleman from Maryland——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Many of these men are retired on salaries of $100 a month. The present rate, running from $120 a month and the higher rates of captain and other officers, firemen and policemen—does the gentleman want me to read the individual cases?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I would like to know what the salary of a patrolman was before the increase is made? Of course, the retirement would be had at 50 per cent.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Generally the pay has been about $100 a month, compared with $120 and $130 now. That is the preponderance of salary received by those men who retire.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Just one more word, and I will finish. Another one of the injustices has been just touched upon by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Take the case of a patrolman who, we will say, gets a salary of $1,200 a year—$100 a month. He is retired on half salary, or on $50 a month; and a captain who gets, instead of $1,200 a year, $3,600 a year. He is retired on half of his salary—a pension of $1,800 a year, or $600 more than his fellow worker received as salary. It costs the patrolman just as much to live as it does the captain, and he does not have the advantage of having a high salary to put aside something for his old age.

If we are going to establish a pension system, let us put all on the same basis and have the maximum which they will be entitled to at retirement, $600, $700, $1,000, or $2,000. Let us have a limit as to what they shall receive and let all retire at the same amount. It is not just or fair that we should make fish of one and fowl of another. Because the chief of the fire department gets $6,000 a year, we retire him on $3,000, whereas a fireman who takes all the risks or most of the risks—and I do not reflect upon the chief—is retired at $600 a year. I think this bill is a step in the wrong direction, and we ought to leave the law as it is until we are ready to amend it so as to meet all cases.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman yielded to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts concluded his remarks?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up but 5 or 10 minutes to make the observation that we have not done enough for the policemen and firemen of the District. I think this committee, of which I am an humble member, has been a little careless about them. I can criticize, as I am a member of that committee. I do not think the committee has done enough for them.

However, if I could pass it, I would have an amendment placed on this bill to make all the expenses of this matter come wholly out of the revenues of the District, but that is a subject which in properly remedying we have got to work out a complete reorganization of the whole fiscal relations not only on this question but on many others, so I am going to wait for the reorganization plan on that subject, and therefore I will not offer such an amendment to this bill.

I want to tell the gentleman from Oklahoma something and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. I want to submit something about policemen and firemen in the District. Now, the policemen down here at the White House, and we have a number of them, and the ones in the grounds and the policemen in the Capitol—does the gentleman want some time?

Mr. HERRICK. Not now.

Mr. BLANTON. Then will he please defer his present conference. The policemen in the White House grounds and the ones in the Capitol and the policemen of the House Office Building are all furnished with all of their equipment and all of their uniforms, and they should be so furnished in addition to the salary. That is nothing but right and proper, but when we come to the policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia I want to call attention to what is done for them. Congress took away from them what they considered a valuable right. Congress by law said, "You must withdraw from organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor." We made every fireman and policeman withdraw from those organizations and they now have nobody here to represent them unless we protect them ourselves. They have no representation here at court; they have no friend to appear for them in court; and therefore we ought to be fair to them in every way; we ought to be fair to them, more just than ever when we have taken such a right away from them.

Now, what do we do to them? We do not give them their equipment. We do not give them their uniforms. We furnish them with motor cycles, it is true. We furnish them with little 38-caliber pistols to cope with the thugs of the country, to cope with the worst lawbreakers in the world, that center here in the Nation's Capital; the lawbreakers who are armed with 45's, that shoot farther and straighter than any other pistol you can get. They must cope with them with a little 38. The lawbreakers have found that out, and you can see in every pistol duel that occurs here in Washington that the policeman is at a disadvantage.

Why do we not give them their uniforms? We ought to do it. Why do we not give them their equipment? We ought to do it. Every time a policeman in Washington has to arrest a lawbreaker he must appear in court against him, if the arrest amounts to anything. It takes evidence to convict that lawbreaker. The policeman serves his full time on his beat, on duty, and then he has to go down and put in two or three or four or five extra hours a day, waiting around the court as a witness to help convict lawbreakers. Do not you think that is arduous on him? That is the hardest work a man ever did, hanging around a courthouse as a witness.

I contend that in addition to furnishing these policemen with their equipment and with their uniform, we ought to permit them to have extra pay when they serve extra time at courthouses as witnesses. It is nothing but right. It is just; it is proper.

Let me tell you another thing that we are derelict in.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. What has that got to do with the man who has retired?

Mr. BLANTON. I was using this as an occasion for making these pertinent observations. I am for these District police and firemen.

I will tell you another thing that we have been a little derelict in. Why do we not give the policemen and firemen a day off each week in lieu of Sunday? We give it to every other employee in this Nation. Why should they not get it? They are entitled to it. We do not give it to them. We ought to do it. I am in favor of giving every man one day off per week in lieu of Sunday. Give him Sunday if possible; but we can not give them all Sunday, and I will tell you why. Some of them have to work on Sunday; some of them have to be there, ready for the fire call; some of them have to be on their beats to protect us against lawbreakers on Sunday. But when they have to work Sundays they ought to have a day off each week in lieu of Sunday.

I want my friends in this House to so importune the chairman of the District Committee and other members of the District Committee that they will take action on such legislation. I have just such a bill pending now before the District Committee, a bill which gives them their uniform and equipment, and gives them a day off in lieu of Sunday, and gives them pay for the time they put in as witnesses in court over their regular time. Why should it not pass? Help me to get it passed for the policemen and firemen of the city, who have no union friend here to plead for them, because the friend they had was taken away by the fiat of Congress. Let us do justice to them.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to take up much of the time of the committee, as the teachers' bill is to come up this afternoon. The only reason I take the floor is that the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] objected a few days ago to a unanimous-consent request of mine to incorporate in the RECORD the appeal made to the Congress of the United States in behalf of the 12,000,000 trade-unionists of Germany.

It is rather significant that, in spite of all the disappointments of the Versailles treaty, the great masses of the common people of Germany should still have faith in America.

There was a time in the history of Congress when petitions were read from the floor and formed the subject of discussion. That was so in the early history of Congress.

I have inquired personally and informally of the Speaker of the House whether he had received officially the appeal. I made that inquiry about a week ago, several days after the Associated Press had reported this incident, this appeal; the Speaker informed me that he had received no official notice. I understand that even if the Speaker would receive a copy of such an appeal he would probably refer it to the Secretary of State, and that Congress would obtain a copy of it only after the Secretary of State would transmit it. The appeal is brief, and I suppose most of you have read it in the press.

I now ask unanimous consent to incorporate this brief appeal in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to include as a part of his remarks the document referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. I presented the question of the Ruhr invasion to this Congress on the 20th of last month, and I expect to take it up again. I will not take any more time of the House at this juncture, as this is probably the last District of Columbia day of this Congress. I shall incorporate the appeal as it appeared in the press.

Following is the document referred to:

To the United States Senate and House of Representatives:

The undersigned federations of labor unions, representing 12,000,000 members, who with their families constitute more than half of Germany's population, again affirm that because of America's positive promise that right and justice shall prevail they substituted democracy for autocracy, submitted to complete disarmament, and gave an unqualified expression of their desire to work for peace and international reconciliation.

The German loves the pursuit of peaceful professions, but he is equally opposed to being made a slave indefinitely or to have the coming generations of his fellow citizens committed to a system of economic bondage. The Ruhr occupation and the Versailles treaty, however, make such a condition of servitude inevitable. They permanently destroy Germany and European economics and threaten unemployment for millions of German workers.

An impartial but authoritative survey of the situation will readily establish this fact and will in addition be able to confirm that in the midst of peace men and women—young and old—are forcibly being evicted from their homes and deported mereby because they have refused to become traitors to their country.

We have been reduced to a nation which is chronically hungry; our infants are wrapped in paper instead of swaddling clothes, while our women and children are succumbing to physical misery.

This appeal is not an attempt to induce the United States to take an attitude in favor of one or the other of the opposing parties. It is an appeal to the traditional American honor and appreciation of fair play. America, we are sure, did not enter the war for the purpose of annihilating the German people. American honor asserted at this time can save Europe and the world from inevitable disaster.

Mr. LONDON. The appeal carries the signatures of the chairmen of the executive boards of the General Federation of Trade-Unions, the Federation of Christian Labor Unions, the League of Clerical Employees, and the Independent Federation of Liberal Trades-Unions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 48 minutes remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOWREY], and 43 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN]; the gentleman from Mississippi first.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made a statement a while ago that I think he ought to explain. I think it ought to go straight in the RECORD. He said, "the worst robbers in the world gather here in the Capital." I would like him to explain whether he meant the Capital City or the Capitol Building.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not include the gentleman from Mississippi, so he need not be uneasy.

Mr. LOWREY. I feel inclined to tell here a thing that happened. I hate to go into a gentleman's family affairs; but it got into the newspapers. It happened in the home of my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. I do not believe he is here. Recently during the night his wife, Mrs. Jones, whispered to him in excitement that there were thieves in the house. He remonstrated with her and insisted that she ought not to make that kind of a charge against the House; that he was sure that proportionately there were more thieves in the Senate than there were in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. GERNERD. What Mr. Jones does the gentleman refer to as being married?

Mr. LOWREY. My friend from Texas, Mr. MARVIN JONES.

Mr. GERNERD. I did not even know he was married.

Mr. LOWREY. I have known him longer than the gentleman has; and he ought to have been married a long time ago, though it may not be his fault.

Mr. GERNERD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LOWREY. I was living in his town the first time he ran for Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Mississippi was speaking about his first marriage.

Mr. KNUTSON. Which marriage is the gentleman speaking about now?

Mr. LOWREY. Do not spoil my story. Mr. Chairman, there are more good speeches ruined on this floor by fool questions than in any other way. [Laughter.] If the gentleman will just let me alone I will make a good speech.

Mr. HAMMER. The gentleman always makes a good speech, anyway.

Mr. LOWREY. I was going to say that my friend remonstrated with Mrs. Jones and said that there were proportionately more thieves in the Senate than there were in the House, and that she ought not to make that kind of a charge against the House. Then he insisted further that if they were in the House the most of them were on the Republican side, and the Republicans were not to be blamed for failure to turn them out, because they have to keep a quorum. [Laughter.] Now here comes the other gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and asserts on the floor that the worst robbers in the Nation gather in the Capital. I do not know whether he means in the Capital City or the Capitol Building. But that much by way of correction of these insinuations.

What I wanted to speak on especially is the principle herein involved. I am sure that we are walking a very dangerous road in the way we are increasing the number of retirements on pay and the amount of the retirement pay; and I want to utter my protest. It seems to me that there is no good reason to suppose that when a man has received a fairly good job at the hands of the city government or the National Government or the State government and has received the pay for years, he should then at a certain age be retired on half pay or part pay, when the very men who have wanted his job badly for all those years and have taken jobs at less pay and other men who have not made half the money that he has been making for those years should be required to pay taxes to keep him on half pay and then let him accept a job somewhere else and receive a salary for that and get his half pay at the hands of the taxpayers besides.

Mr. SPROUL. Does not the gentleman know that all these policemen and firemen are assessed for this insurance fund?

Mr. LOWREY. I know they are assessed 1½ per cent. I am willing for a man in any official position to be paid out of his own assessments, if he wishes to do that; but I am discussing the practice so constantly followed which comes out in the matter of bonuses and pensions to soldiers and men in various lines of work, and in retirement pay in the Army and Navy and everywhere else. I believe we ought to call a halt and to stop the trend toward the idea that when a man has held a public position of any kind for a number of years then he is to be retired on pension or part pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the committee is a Senate bill. It passed the Senate some time ago and was considered by our committee. It has been submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and they have approved this bill. It seeks to equalize the pension rate received by disabled firemen and policemen, and makes the rate of pension received by them comparable with the pensions received by men who retired under an increase in pay. It affects about 400 firemen and policemen and the widows and orphans of those men. It will cost approximately $41,000 per annum, a part of which is paid by an assessment on the firemen and policemen now in the service. There should be no opposition to this measure. These men, who have served the District for many years and have been disabled in the service, have to live under the same conditions of cost and expense as those retired under an increase in pay. This simply seeks to equalize the pension rates received and to put all of them on an equal basis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the government of the District contribute anything to the pension fund?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Every appropriation bill for the District of Columbia carries an amount sufficient to make up the deficit, and there are also paid into this fund the fines imposed on firemen and policemen for neglect of duty, misconduct, or anything of that kind. In the old days the money received from dog licenses or something of that kind went into this fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the old days, before the officers were obliged to contribute to the fund, the fines levied against criminals in the police court were the means of supplying these pensions, and, as I understand it, that is still continued.

Mr. EVANS. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. And, in addition to that, it provides this installment. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS], who is a member of the subcommittee on appropriations for the District of Columbia, if he knows the amount of money the Government is obliged to contribute annually to make up this fund?

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. EVANS. I rose to correct the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. The fines assessed against criminals do not go into this fund at all, but unless there is an adverse decision by the comptroller they will be divided between the District treasury and the Treasury of the United States at the ratio of 60–40.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the policemen and firemen paid any assessment the entire fund was replenished from the fines levied against criminals. That may have been changed in the last act.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will read the law to the gentleman if he will permit me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is found in chapter 433 of the Statutes of 1916:

The said fund shall consist of all fines imposed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon members of the police and fire departments of said District by way of discipline; all rewards, proceeds of gifts, and emoluments that may be received by any member of said departments (for extraordinary services), except such part thereof as the said commissioners may allow to be retained by members of said departments; a deduction of 1½ per cent of the monthly salary of each member of said departments; donations and the net proceeds of sales of unclaimed property in the custody of the property clerk of the police department; all of which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the "policemen and firemen's relief fund, District of Columbia."

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield.

Mr. EVANS. I wish to state, as supplementary to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, that in 1878 the law provided that the maintenance of the firemen and policemen fund should be paid exclusively by the District, but as it happens it never has been so done. It has been paid 50-50 until we changed it and made it 60-40. But there was a time, I do not know whether by enactment outside of an appropriation bill or not, that the fines assessed in the police court were taken to pay a portion of this fund. In answer to the question the gentleman propounded as to the amount, it is fixed each year on the sum necessary to make the necessary amount. I can not give the gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give it generally?

Mr. EVANS. No; I can not give it near enough to make it worth while.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further debate be dispensed with and the bill read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object to that; there is no demand for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act all persons upon the pension rolls of the police and fire departments of the District of Columbia who were granted relief in accordance with laws enacted prior to December 5, 1919, shall receive such relief as is allowable under existing law, and all persons now or hereafter receiving relief from the policemen and firemen's relief fund shall also be entitled to all pension benefits resulting from any increase in pay that has or may hereafter be granted by Congress: Provided, That no arrears of pension shall be granted for any period prior to an application for an increase in pension under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That any widow entitled to relief from the policemen and firemen's relief fund may hereafter receive not more than $60 per month.

SEC. 2. That all acts and parts of acts to the extent that they are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF CERTAIN STREETS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 8084, for the change of certain streets in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-six Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills reported by the District of Columbia Committee and finding itself without a quorum had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 232 Members had responded to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees to be printed in the RECORD and the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee? I find there is a great deal of strenuous opposition to this bill. There will be a motion made by a Member on the gentleman's side of the House to strike out the enacting clause. There will be a fight against it made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] and my colleague [Mr. BULWINKLE] is against it. What is the use of going on with this when there is so much opposition to it? Why can not we take up a bill to which there is no opposition. I suggest to the chairman that he take up some other bill.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, this is an extraordinary proposition. This is one of the most important bills that has been reported by the committee and was reported virtually without opposition. My policy is to see that bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia are considered and voted upon. I do not think the gentleman from Texas is going to find so much opposition as he thinks against the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. All right. The gentleman will probably find the throat of his bill cut.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8084) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia; and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for the necessary extensions and additional buildings to be erected at the Walter Reed General Hospital, in the District of Columbia, all public streets except Fourteenth Street, and alleys included within the area bounded by Sixteenth Street on the west, Alaska Avenue on the northwest, Fern Street on the north, Georgia Avenue on the east, and Aspen Street, as platted on the official survey map, on the south, be, and the same hereby are, vacated, abandoned, and closed, the portions of public streets within said area which are hereby abandoned and closed by this act being known as Thirteenth Street, Fifteenth Street, Dahlia Street, Dogwood Street, and Elder Street.

SEC. 2. That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1, of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to the southern boundary of the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, all in accordance with the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extensions or widening, plus the costs and expenses of the proceeding hereunder, four-tenths shall be assessed against the property which the jury shall find to be benefited.

SEC. 3. That when Fourteenth Street shall be opened for traffic to the south boundary of the property known as the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, numbered for purposes of assessment and taxation as parcel 89 sub 7, the control and jurisdiction of that part of Fourteenth Street as laid down on the plan of the permanent system of highways of the District of Columbia which lies within the said hospital grounds, shall immediately pass to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the same in all respects as other streets and avenues in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the grade of the street through the hospital grounds shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, is hereby authorized, payable out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; the amounts collected as benefits to be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for two minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimouse consent to address the committee out of order for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. If it were not for the fact that we are approaching the close of the session with a very great deal of business needing attention, it would be proper and seemly, and I am sure that all of us would be disposed, to devote a considerable portion of this day to exercises in memory of the great emancipator, the savior of his country, the man in whose memory a grateful people have just erected a magnificent monument on the banks of the Potomac. Notwithstanding the fact that the press of important public business prevents an extended program, we all desire, I am sure, that we shall have at least a brief program in honor of the martyred President; therefore I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] may have five minutes in which to address the committee on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas be given five minutes in which to address the committee on the life of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, it is well that we pause even in the midst of the pressure of business to-day to note the fact that this is the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. One hundred and fourteen years ago to-day he was born, and for half that many years now he has "belonged to the ages."

There is no new thing to be said of Lincoln. There is no new thing to be said of the mountains, or of the sea, or of the stars. The years go their way, but the same old mountains lift their granite shoulders above the drifting clouds, and the same mysterious sea beats upon the shore, and the same silent stars keep holy vigil above a tired world. But to mountain and sea and star men turn forever in unwearied homage. And thus, with Lincoln, for he was mountain in grandeur of spirit; he was sea in under voice of mystic loneliness; he was star in steadfast purity of purpose and of service. And he, too, abides. The years go their way, but with the name of Lincoln childhood still learns to voice a patriot's devotion, and with the name of Lincoln tears are called from old men's eyes, and there is no new thing to be said of him. But while the Republic endures, upon whose altar he laid his great mind and heart, while liberty is cherished, while civic virtue and service and sacrifice are honored in the earth, the name of Lincoln will be spoken in undying love by the sons of men. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] may address the committee for five minutes upon the subject of Abraham Lincoln.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] be permitted to address the committee for five minutes upon the life of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, unexpectedly bidden to this moment, I felt that I would be recreant to every impulse of patriotism and national good will if I did not respond, although I had no time for preparation. Fortunately, any real American, appreciating rugged worth and lofty genius and rejoicing in the present fellowship of our reunited country, needs no specific preparation to speak a word of honest admiration for that great, typical American, Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] In that immortal message of Henry W. Grady before the New England dinner, the message that arrested the hearts of the Nation as the first southerner who had been invited to attend a New England society since the Civil War, he uttered that inspiring declaration concerning Lincoln. Doctor Talmage and General Sherman had talked about the ideal American as yet to come, when Grady said, "I am here to say to you that the ideal American has already come in the person and the spirit of Abraham Lincoln." No other man who has given himself to the building of American thought and American ideals had so much in his veins or in his place of birth or in the atmosphere that shaped his early manhood and his political affiliations to make him the typical American, capable of being honored alike by the sons of the South and the sons of the North. [Applause.] And really, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, if I may be permitted a suggestion, I think that no celebration of Lincoln's birthday or of Washington's birthday, as for that, can ever be complete in this House if tribute is paid only by a son of the North. Lincoln carried in his veins and in the simple glory of his cabin birth the blood of the South, and in his ideals the inspiration and training of Illinois, the robust spirit of the West and the North.

We love, in an hour like this, to think of him, not as born in Kentucky or reared in Illinois, but as a son of all America [applause], and it is fitting, I think, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the personal equation, that the son of a Confederate soldier whose father taught his boys around the family altar to love the flag of their reunited country, should be permitted in this National House of Representatives to lay a tribute of faith and love and honor upon the stainless name of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] May I add this other word. I rejoice not in divisions and partisan contentions but in the national fellowship of an hour of common purpose. I am a son of the South—I plead guilty to the soft impeachment; I was born beneath the ambient blue of her arching skies, I was rocked in the cradle of her beauty and glory, I am proud of her priceless contribution to the building of this Nation; but, loyal as I am to the memory of my fathers, their traditions and their heroic loyalties, I love always an hour like this that makes us forget the aisle between us and the lines of political and sectional cleavage—that makes us shake hands as one people beneath the beauty of those stars and the glory of those stripes that we all love so well. [Applause.]

I love to think of another thing in this hour, when official leadership and personal example are so greatly needed. I know some of you will smile when I say it, but go on and let the smile widen into nation-wide approval. I love to remember that Abraham Lincoln, recognizing the responsibility of leadership, wrote with his own hand and signed with his own pen a pledge of total abstinence from strong drink, and urged the young manhood of America to follow his example. [Applause.]

And if he were living now, with his God-fearing spirit and his clear-headed patriotism, he would declare that the supreme question before the American people is the integrity of the Constitution, the majesty of the law, and personal and national sobriety. As a son of the South, as a friend of sobriety, law and order, and as the friend of an all-embracing Americanism, I rejoice to crown the memory of Abraham Lincoln, the typical American. [Applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to understand just why there should be opposition to this bill, as stated by the gentleman from Texas a few moments ago. This bill has the approval——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has the gentleman read my report on this subject, Report No. 214, on the bill reported by the Military Affairs Committee with reference to the closing of streets, including——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; I will state to the gentleman I have not read the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. He certainly should have read the report of the committee which gave investigation to this subject.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. HILL. I should like to say in reference to the report of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] that since that report the Secretary of War has written to the gentleman's committee in favor of this bill and against the original bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is right. I will say to the members of the committee this bill has the approval of former Secretary of War Baker, it has the approval of the War Department through the present Secretary of War, it has the approval of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, it has the approval of the Federal Highway Commission, and it has the unanimous approval of the Commissioners of the District. It has the unanimous approval of the District of Columbia Committee of the Senate; it was unanimously passed by the Senate, and, now, who is opposed to the bill? The Surgeon General of the Army is said to be opposed to the bill and Army officers come in here and appeal to Members not to vote for this bill because it puts a street through what is called Walter Reed Hospital grounds, and when they come to Congress and ask for appropriation they speak of it as the Army medical center, and they appeal to Members of Congress to oppose a policy adopted by the War Department and by the Secretary of War, so that when they come here in reference to this bill they speak of it as the Walter Reed Hospital grounds. Now, this bill does more than extend Fourteenth Street through the hospital grounds. It closes five streets through the Walter Reed Hospital reservation, and then it proposes, it accordance with the plans drawn not only by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, not only approved by the Secretary of War, but a map here prepared in the office of the Surgeon General, showing how this street cuts through, not the Walter Reed Hospital grounds, but through the Army medical center on Sixteenth Street, between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets. It is the desire of these officers that the White House shall sit at one end of Sixteenth Street, the Avenue of the Presidents, and this Army medical center should be at the other, and when any plebeian dares to propose that a thoroughfare should be cut through this Army medical center, why they raise the cry about the disabled service men in the hospital wards, and yet during the past five years when these disabled soldiers were in the hospital wards at the Walter Reed Hospital they were on the car line on Georgia Avenue or as close to it as it was possible to get them.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand the situation, if Fourteenth Street is extended, as contemplated by this bill, all of the hospital buildings will still be on the east side of the street?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The hospital wards will be a great deal closer to the existing car line on Seventh Street or Georgia Avenue, as it is named after it leaves Florida Avenue. Now, the wards under the plans proposed by the Surgeon General of the Army, who opposes this bill, will be closer to Georgia Avenue than they will be under this proposed depressed street on Fourteenth Street extended.

Mr. BLACK. There really will not be any hospital buildings that will be west of Fourteenth Street, will there?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; no hospital buildings will be west of Fourteenth Street or within a block of it, but this proposed street, if this proposed legislation is adopted, will go through the faculty officers' quarters, the museum, the library, student Army officers' quarters, and under the plan proposed by the Surgeon General of the Army the wards will be closer to the car line on Georgia Avenue than they will be to Fourteenth Street.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If I understand the statement correctly, these surgeons would rather discommode the entire public than have one or two medical officers inconvenienced in their conception of what is proper and right.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska the Surgeon General, in his testimony before the Federal Highway Commission, said this would destroy the beautiful outlook, or the beauty of the landscape, or the beauty of the grounds, or some expression of that kind. I have his statement here.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman think these car lines running through there will contribute to the comfort of these boys who are sick in bed?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Surely the gentleman must not have been in the House, because I stated this proposed extension of the Fourteenth Street was farther away from the hospital wards than the existing car line.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If it does not inconvenience these boys in any way, why do not the medical officers in charge of the Walter Reed Hospital approve it? May I ask the gentleman if he thinks they would have any selfish interest in it? I think the only interest would be that for the welfare and ease of these sick boys they would oppose it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I stated that he said that it would destroy the beauty of the landscape or the beauty of the grounds.

Mr. KINCHELOE. If that is true, is not that as good a ground for one to be against this bill as that it is to be for the benefit of these real-estate fellows who went out into Maryland beyond Walter Reed Hospital?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will restate that I know of no real-estate men not in favor of the bill, or any of the civic organizations here.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I would not imagine they are opposing it very seriously.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think the civic organizations are all for it. Anyone who has gone into the matter thoroughly and recognizes the hardships that will be put upon the people who have invested in their little homes under plans prepared by the Federal highway commission will realize that they were interested in getting a street to go out there. I think anyone who has investigated the matter, as have the former Secretary of War and the present Secretary of War and the District Commissioners and the Senate committee, would favor it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Who would have more intimate knowledge as to the effect it would have on the patients out there than Colonel Glennon?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The Secretary of War.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The Secretary of War with his many duties probably knows practically nothing about it.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that desirable surroundings are an important thing with respect to a hospital? Would it not be a mistake to destroy those beautiful surroundings, and does not the gentleman think that it would have a most detrimental effect on the condition of the patients there to do that?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the patients are brought into this matter and the fear that they will be disturbed has been held out; but I will say to my friend that during the past five years those same patients, grievously wounded, have been placed almost on a car line on Seventh Street and on Georgia Avenue, so that if the Medical Department is so solicitous about the disabled men in Walter Reed, why did they build these Army buildings so close?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman stated some time ago that this does not run close to any of the present hospital wards. Would not this interfere with the extension and the future development of the hospital and the building of more wards?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This plan that I have here was prepared in the office of the Surgeon General himself. These are the proposed buildings. Here are the wards [indicating on plan], and here is Georgia Avenue, and here is the proposed extension through Fourteenth Street. The Army Medical Corps proposes that the car line should go there [indicating], and the closing of this other street, after all the other streets were closed, was evidently an afterthought on the part of the Surgeon General of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for 10 minutes additional.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield for just a question, for information?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Is anything brought out in the hearings about the need of this additional car line for the convenience of the convalescent soldiers in getting to and from town?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will answer that. This is the situation, I will say to the members of the committee: Under the proposed highway plan of the District of Columbia this military reservation is intersected by six streets, and it is proposed in this bill that five of those streets shall be closed, but because of the injustice, and because of the hardship placed upon the people who have bought property and little homes beyond the reservation, it is proposed by the War Department itself, by the former Secretary of War, and the present Secretary of War, and by the Chief of Engineers, and by the District commissioners that this street, Fourteenth Street, which is the main highway of travel into the northwest, shall be carried through the Walter Reed Hospital at a depressed level, upon plans to be approved by, or plans subject to the approval of, the War Department itself.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HULL. At the time the people referred to purchased this real estate for homes the Walter Reed Hospital was there, was it not? They knew it was there?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; and through that section, according to the permanent plan of the Highway Commission of the District of Columbia, which can only be changed by act of Congress, it was proposed that these streets be extended. That is very true.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The hospital grounds at Walter Reed had about 42 acres originally, had they not, and then they were enlarged subsequently?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; by taking in Fourteenth Street and Sixteenth Street. That was an afterpurchase.

Mr. MILLER. How much to the right and how much to the left will the street car lines be?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I suppose it will conform with the majority of the streets in the District; 40 feet.

Mr. MILLER. Will it divide the grounds into two tracts of approximately equal size? What is the proportion?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The proportion between Fourteenth Street and Sixteenth Street is about one-sixth.

Mr. MILLER. One-sixth will be detached and five-sixths——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. About one-third. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is about one-third. Now, unless this legislation is agreed to by the Congress, this street remains open. It is open on the permanent highway plan of the District of Columbia. It takes an act of Congress to close this street. It also takes an act of Congress to close Thirteenth Street, and it takes an act of Congress to close Fifteenth Street and the cross streets from east to west. Nothing will be gained by the defeat of this measure, because until Congress acts and closes all of these streets, or unless the Federal Highway Commission closes the portion of the streets that are not dedicated, that remains open, and this military reservation can not be improved in accordance with the proposed plans of the Surgeon General's office.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SWING. Does the gentleman know the depth at which this will be put down—how far below the level of the surrounding street?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It will be at a depth subject to the approval of the War Department.

Mr. SWING. Will it be a regular canyon?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state that this matter has been passed upon by men who are competent engineers, because they are at the head of the Engineer Corps of the Army. I can tell you about the cost, but I can not say about the style or depth of the canyon.

Mr. SWING. The committee is considering the condition of the patients out there. How much of the canyon is to be left open? Has the committee any information on that?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. You might ask the Army engineers, who prepared this map, and the men in the Surgeon General's office, because they have evidently given it a great deal of thought. This is the situation: Fourteenth Street has been dedicated to the very edge of the reservation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Has there been any estimate made of what this will cost?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HULL. What do they think will be the actual cost? Of course that is a minor part of the proposition, but I would like to know.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that it will cost about 50 per cent less than the plan proposed by the gentleman's colleagues on the committee.

Mr. HULL. What will it cost to pave this street? They will have to pave it if they run that street through there.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Oh, no. This bill provides that the expense shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HULL. What is the amount? Have you figured on it?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not claim to be an engineer, and I do not pretend to be a layman engineer.

Mr. HULL. What will it be? Which plan is the gentleman defending?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The plan for the extension of Fourteenth Street.

Mr. HULL. By which plan?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. By the plan agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. HULL. You claim the Secretary of War indorsed it. Show us.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will read you a letter.

Mr. HULL. He simply transmitted a letter. That is all.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. If a Cabinet officer sends a letter to Congress indorsing legislation, I should think that would be taken as an indication that he is for it.

Mr. HULL. Read us the letter and show us where the Secretary of War indorses it.

Mr. FOCHT. What is that?

Mr. HULL. Read the letter where the Secretary of War indorses it and recommends it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will read it.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman want to read it?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; I will read it.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 13, 1921.

Hon. L. H. BALL,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: At the request of the chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia, the highway commission of the District of Columbia considered some months ago H. R. 5824 and H. R. 5579, relating to certain streets in and in the vicinity of Walter Reed Hospital in Washington. In view of the important bearing that the provisions of these bills would have on the future development of the District of Columbia, as well as on the Walter Reed Hospital, a public hearing was held on the subject, at which all parties interested were afforded an opportunity to express their views. The highway commission, after very careful consideration of the case, arrived at the opinion that Fourteenth Street should not be closed through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds, but should be preserved for future needs of the District, with such grades, when eventually opened, that traffic will prove of as little inconvenience or annoyance to the hospital as possible. I inclose a copy of a letter written to the chairman of the House Committee on the District of Columbia expressing these views. I may state that Mr. FOCHT has introduced a bill in the form recommended in that letter as H. R. 8084.

This matter is brought to your attention at the request of Senator WELLER, in connection with the consideration of H. R. 5824 and S. 1575.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

Mr. HULL. Is that the only indorsement your committee had from the Secretary of War? He does not indorse it in that letter.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. He says Fourteenth Street should not be closed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. He says the highway commission says so.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. He is chairman of the Federal Highway Commission.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Did the gentleman notice that the Secretary of War says:

I may state that Mr. FOCHT has introduced a bill in the form recommended in that letter as H. R. 8084—

Showing conclusively that he indorses the recommendation?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. When I read to the gentleman a letter in which the Secretary of War says that he believes that the evident needs of the District are such that Fourteenth Street should not be closed, I can not make it any plainer.

Mr. HULL. That is not his view. That is the highway commission's view.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The Secretary of War is chairman of the Federal Highway Commission, and I will say for the information of the gentleman that the other members are the Chief Engineer of the Army, the Secretary of the Interior, and one other official whose name I have forgotten.

Mr. HULL. There is not a word in that letter which says that the Secretary of War indorses it. He says this matter is brought to your attention; that is all.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will read the gentleman the opinion of the Chief of Engineers of the Army.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman has not answered my question yet as to the cost.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The cost will be approximately $121,000, according to the estimates of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will ask the gentleman whether that includes the walls on either side, 15 or 16 feet high?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am not familiar with the plan.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does that include the bridges?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It includes the plan approved by the War Department.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It seems to me that with 500 feet of walls on either side and the bridges it will cost a great deal more than $120,000.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Fourteenth Street has been dedicated up to the eastern edge of the Walter Reed Hospital grounds, and then it has been dedicated on the west of the grounds out to the Maryland line, and thousands of small home owners who have been led by the permanent highway plan of the District of Columbia and by the assurances given by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia to believe that they would have rapid transit into the city have purchased lots and built homes west of the hospital grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman want any more time?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No.

Mr. FOCHT. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. TEMPLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills reported from the District of Columbia, and finding itself without a quorum he caused the roll to be called, when 218 Members had responded, and he presented a list of the absentees for printing in the Journal and the RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I want the House to be in order, and I want to announce that I will not yield——

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that that motion is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the motion that the committee rise is a preferential one and is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that when a gentleman has been recognized on the floor, as was done in this case, he can not be taken off the floor by moving that the committee rise without overruling the rules of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the gentleman from Oklahoma having been recognized but not having commenced his remarks——

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I want to see whether a poor devil has any rights.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee was on his feet before the gentleman from Oklahoma was recognized, and moved that the committee rise. The Chair failed to recognize him and then I made the motion when I saw that the Chair had not recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the appeal. I am one of the last men in this House to support an appeal from the decision of the Chair if I think there is any doubt as to the correctness of the ruling of the Chair. In this controversy I have no interest. I do not care to hear the Member from Oklahoma. The only interest I have is maintaining the rules of the House in an ordinary, consistent, and parliamentary method of procedure. This ruling, if adhered to, establishes a bad precedent.

When a Member is recognized there is but one thing that will take him off the floor, and that is a point of order that there is no quorum. If there is no quorum, the House can not transact any business, not even hear a Member speak. I recognize that a motion that the committee rise is analogous to a motion to adjourn when we are in the House and it is of the highest privilege, provided the Chair is open to entertain that motion. When the Chair recognizes a Member to speak, whether that Member actually commences to talk or not, if he is recognized and has the floor time runs against him. I do not believe there is but one way that he can be taken off the floor and that is by a point of order that no quorum is present if he is proceeding in an orderly way. If a quorum is present, he is entitled to the floor and entitled to proceed. If we do not observe our rules, the House may become a mob. It is with reluctance that I shall be constrained to vote to overrule the decision of the Chair. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from Georgia at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is entitled to recognition. The gentleman stood in his place and made a motion that the committee rise before the Chair had recognized anyone. For some reason or other the Chair did not recognize him. I know he did make that motion, because I had talked with him in regard to it. I saw the gentleman was not recognized and so I made the motion. I still insist that my motion was in order. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania was on his feet and did make a motion before the gentleman from Oklahoma was recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. If I have the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] rose in his place and yielded 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK]. That is a fact. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] made a point that no quorum was present after the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK] was recognized. A call of the House was had and a quorum developed, and by every ordinary right and rule of procedure the gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in this other than to uphold the rules of the House. I want to make an appeal to the Chair, predicated on facts that I think the Chair will recall. Before the roll call developed a quorum, the gentleman from Oklahoma had been recognized. There can be no doubt about that. As soon as the quorum was developed the committee found itself in the exact status that it was when the point of no quorum was made. Speaker after Speaker has held that the committee rises to receive the report, and for that purpose only, and that even the Speaker can not recognize anybody, but the House automatically goes back into committee. When we got back into the committee under the parliamentary law of this body the gentleman from Oklahoma was in possession of the floor, and in addition to that, Mr. Chairman, the Chair distinctly stated "The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 20 minutes."

Then some one in the confusion moved that the committee rise. It makes no difference if some one had asked the Chair for recognition before the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK] had been recognized again. He still had the floor, and I appeal to the Chair, on mature reflection, to recall the ruling which he has made, because it will lead to an end that will destroy orderly procedure in the Committee of the Whole. We can not afford that simply because some gentleman may not like to hear the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all of the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. If the gentleman from Arkansas said that the gentleman from Oklahoma was recognized before the point of order was made, he is, I think, mistaken——

Mr. BLANTON. He was recognized and had the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. He was yielded time, and that gives him no right until he is recognized. The mere yielding of time can not hold this House in session against its will.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Let us have that perfectly clear. The mere yielding of time can not hold this House in session against its will.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. After the quorum was found to be present, the Chairman took his place, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, entitled to recognition, moved that the committee rise before the Chairman had recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma. The Chair does not seem to have heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but a dozen gentlemen here heard him, and there is no doubt that he made that motion. Mr. Chairman, I still insist that my motion would have been in order, but the Chair is not called upon to decide that question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] did make the motion, and it was the duty of the Chair to recognize him. The Chair apparently did not hear him.

Mr. WINGO. As a matter of fact, the first thing that happened was that the Chair stated the gentleman from Oklahoma was recognized, and instead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] making the motion, as a matter of fact it was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] who made the motion that the committee rise. If there is any question about it, the reporter's notes will show the facts.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have consent to make a statement in connection with this matter. It is fair enough and true enough that I did yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK].

Mr. BLANTON. And he was recognized.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not know that he was recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the reporter's notes on that question.

Mr. FOCHT. I yielded him 20 minutes, but as time went on and the controversy extended it was apparent to me that we could not conclude the bill to-night. We found opposition to be developing, and while under ordinary circumstances I would have gone ahead with the idea of hearing the gentleman's speech, letting him occupy the 20 minutes, it was decided that we would rise and have the committee report the bill back to the House, and I rose to my feet for that purpose and made the motion, taking it for granted that if I happened to be a little more dilatory than is customary it was due to the fact that I would be recognized more readily than if I had not been the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, and reporting the bill from the committee. My thought, so far as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK] was concerned, was that his speech might go over with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Previous to the point of order that no quorum was present the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] yielded 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HERRICK], and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma by name. Then the committee rose, and the Chair reported that a quorum was present after the roll had been called. The Chair has no desire to prejudice the gentleman from Oklahoma. As a matter of fact, the Chair himself suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from Oklahoma be given time in order to present certain views he holds. The Chair is less inclined to override any precedent in this House or to misinterpret the rules; but the Chair feels that the motion to rise even after a Member has been recognized, but before the Member has commenced debate, is an entirely privileged motion and is in order. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and is perfectly willing to submit this to the members of the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that you can not move to lay a motion on the table in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is entirely a question of recognition and is not appealable.

Mr. BLANTON. I have already appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But the question of recognition is not appealable.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I ask that the matter be submitted to the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, section 737 of the Manual and Digest in the last note——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I want to respectfully call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the question here involved is not one of recognition. The question involved here is one of overruling a point of order by the Chair, from which an appeal was made, and it seems to me clear that the committee is entitled to pass on the question of whether it will sustain the decision of the Chair in overruling the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has correctly stated the situation. The Chair recognizes the point made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], and in referring to the rule to which he refers, feels that that point was made entirely upon a question of recognition. The Chair feels that the question before the committee now is not one of recognition but is a question of deciding a point of order. The Chair is therefore going to submit to the committee the question of whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the committee; and in order that the matter may be entirely impartial, the Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN, to take the chair.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I call for tellers. That will settle the question.

Mr. MADDEN assumed the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. BLANTON and Mr. FOCHT were appointed to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 70, noes 78.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HICKS). The Chair has enjoyed so many acts of kindness on the part of the Members of this House that the Chair wants to say he does not feel at all badly at being overruled, and perhaps the committee is right. [Applause.] The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I want to announce before starting reading this speech or address, or whatever you choose to call it, that I shall decline to yield [laughter] or to answer any questions. I have promised the chairman of this committee that if I should conclude the reading of this matter inside of 20 minutes I would yield back the balance of the time.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order because it is evident there is a quorum present.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I arise for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to a matter wherein flagrant insult has been offered to one Member of the House directly and to the whole membership of the House indirectly. The insult complained of and for which the complaining Member, Hon. MANUEL HERRICK, demands the protection of the House, is the unwarranted and unjustified publication of slander, lies, and libel since the 4th day of September, 1921, up to the present time almost daily. The basis of this complaint is an article published in the Washington Herald and in the Washington Times of February 6, 1923, and which article they were duly warned was slanderous and libelous and untrue and for which, if they did publish the same, they would be sued at law, and that a resolution expelling their representatives from the press gallery, lobby, corridors, and cloak rooms of the House would be introduced in the House, and they hooted at me and expressed their contempt for the House, declaring that they would print what they pleased regardless whether it was true or not, just so that it made news, thereby insulting the whole House and holding the House in contempt and ridicule. The slanderous portions of the article complained of are herewith set forth:

Representative MANUEL HERRICK, who said he was the "lonesomest man in town" and got sued for breach of promise by a Follies beauty, has had another romance shattered.

Rival wrecks HERRICK'S new love romance.

Now he styles himself "The spark-plug lover" and engages sleuths to get even.

Bigger fish in the sea.

Dare-devil Congressman, jilted by Miss Nettie Morrison, clerk at Veterans' Bureau.

Representative MANUEL HERRICK, describing himself as the "Spark-plug lover" [laughter] had another romance crash to earth last night after he had forsaken his airplane to take a flight on the wings of love, when his offer of marriage to a young Washington woman was definitely rejected.

ENGAGES SLEUTHS.

Portraying one of the most fervent courtships in the history of Washington, the latest love affair of the flying Representative came to light only after it was learned that he had employed the O'Dea Detective Agency to help him "get a line on" his rivals.

Despite his resourcefulness, the dare-devil of Congress, according to his own words, was told by Miss Nettie Morrison, 1916 N Street NW., "to be a-packin' away," because she would never consent to be his bride.

"I am going for deep water after big fish."

The pleadings of a congressional lover failing to influence the lady fair to reveal the name of the rival, Representative HERRICK sought recourse to his detective agency. Lawrence J. O'Dea was engaged to learn what manner of man it was who could pay successful court when a Congressman's hat was in the ring.

He visited the young woman at her home and made a final statement of his cause. She refused.

Miss Morrison, from Idaho, declared last night that she "would not marry the suitor if he was President of the United States."

The reason that these journalistic jackals, wolves, and hyenas of newspaperdom have it in for me and want to destroy me politically is because on August 12, 1921, and September 28, 1921, I introduced two bills that would put a crimp in their profits, to wit, bill No. 8208 and bill No. 8454. The first would put a stop to the profits which the papers make through running beauty contests, which is in reality camouflaged advertising for the benefit of the procurers throughout the country, and who work both directly after and through the medium of the movie film company, thus obtaining the names of the girls through this method, and the second one is to tax some of the Fatty-Arbuckleism out of the movie film companies, thereby placing a heavy tax upon what has come to be one of the papers' best customers, which would cause said customers to insist upon the papers destroying the standing, credit, and good name of anyone interfering with their profits.

H. R. 8208 (67th Cong., 1st sess.). In the House of Representatives, August 12, 1921, Mr. HERRICK introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

A bill prescribing rules and regulations under which newspapers and advertising agencies may hold prize contests, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any newspaper or advertising agency to hold any prize contest or beauty contest where money or any other thing of value is given away or promised to be given away where the contestant does not have to obtain subscriptions or exchange any labor therefor.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any newspaper or other advertising agency to hold any beauty contest contrary to this act or any contest wherein any moving-picture company or film producer or theatrical company are allowed to participate therein.

SEC. 3. That any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in the sum of $5,000, or imprisonment for the period of one year, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

H. R. 8454 (67th Cong., 1st sess.). In the House of Representatives, September 28, 1921, Mr. HERRICK introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the purpose of raising revenue, diverting a portion of the citizenship of the Nation from nonproductive employment to productive employment, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any person manufacturing a movie film, producing a photoplay, or exhibiting a moving-picture show, or running a vaudeville show or theatrical show shall be required to pay into the United States Treasury 50 per cent of their ticket sales, if operating a show, or net profits, if a manufacturer of films.

SEC. 2. That any person having been convicted of a violation of this act shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 for each offense.

SEC. 3. That each day that any person, company, or corporation shall carry on business in violation of this act shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

The method by which the procurer works is, first, to go to a certain newspaper, or chain of newspapers, and induce them to put on a beauty contest, and after the contest is over and the silly girls having competed for some bauble or cheap prize, and thus furnished their names, addresses, and photographs, they next select, first, orphans; second, daughters of widow women; and, third, daughters of poor people who would be unable to make much, if any, trouble for them at law, and offer them a position at a fabulous salary in the movies, taking them a great distance from home. Some are given a fake try-out and then discharged penniless in a strange city, to be immediately approached by a procurer and taken to the underworld, and others are taken directly to the underworld, without any pretense of giving them a job in a movie-film company. The unfortunate fact remains that approximately $3,000,000,000 are spent for immoral purposes in the United States, of which $500,000,000 is spent in the city of New York alone. It has been estimated that 500,000 young girls are debauched and taken to the underworld in the United States each year, and 50,000 of these are in the city of New York alone.

We legislate on the subject of bugs, beasts, and birds, but it seems like we can not legislate in the interest of human beings, and why any legislature should be willing that this debauchery should continue unhampered, unimpeded, and unchecked is beyond my understanding. I herewith include a sample of this kind of advertising taken from the Wichita Beacon published at Wichita, Kans., on July 21, 1922:

Here's real prize contest for Wichita girls.

[Laughter.]

Here is where some Wichita girl has a chance to do a great public service and at the same time win a wonderful prize. For years and years the world has been trying to find a wife for the Prince of Wales. No luck. Plenty of girls have been willing, but the right one has not appeared to date. Princesses and patrician young ladies of all sorts have been suggested, but the coy heart of the young heir to the throne has remained untouched.

With the fate of the Empire hanging in the balance, more or less, our British cousins are becoming worried. They want a wife for Prince Edward.

Well, the Beacon has decided to provide one. More than that, it has decided that the most fitting wife for the prince ought to be a Wichita girl.

Why not? American girls, and Wichita girls especially, are the grandest girls in the world, aren't they? They are. All right, then all we need to do is to let the girls come forward.

On this page, we will print their pictures. From among the pictures, we will pick the winner. And the winner will get the grand prize. She will be permitted to marry the prince—provided the prince is willing.

Out of the hundreds of pictures that will arrive at the Beacon office this evening, as a result of this announcement, we will print one to-morrow. And one a day from then on.

Watch for the first one. And for the others. You may see someone you know.

This ridiculous article put out for bait to catch the silly young girls has been selected from among many hundreds to show the extent to which these procurers will go to obtain victims. Any sensible man would know that the Prince of Wales could not marry a Wichita girl, for the reason that princes are required to marry some one of so-called noble blood; but many silly and giddy girls would not know that and reading in the papers of the many American heiresses who had married in the lesser nobility—the counts and no accounts, mostly no accounts—would be deluded thereby and induced to send in their names and addresses.

The Washington Times and the Washington Herald and the New York World, and other papers associated with them in their frantic desire to injure me and destroy my usefulness as a legislator, have had in their employ from September 4, 1921, to June 30, 1922, an actress, and had said actress give out false interviews to the papers in which she stated that I was her lover and that I had proposed marriage and that, after proposing marriage, I had jilted her, and that she had sued me for $50,000 for breach of promise. The facts are that I had never been her lover, never promised to marry her, and had never been sued by her for breach of promise nor for any other purpose [laughter], no more than any other Member of this House had, and said fact was well known to all of said papers. Yet, despite that fact, they continue to publish the lie broadcast to the world that I had been sued for breach of promise by said actress with the willful and malicious intent to injure my standing and good name as a citizen and to destroy my usefulness as a legislator. To show the widespread extent of this conspiracy, I herewith append an extract from the Astoria Budget published at Astoria, Oreg:

Not since our own Congressman Lafferty was strutting and fretting about the Nation's Capital has there been such a ——— in Congress as Representative MANUEL HERRICK, of Oklahoma, is proving himself to be. Like Lafferty, he likes pretty girls and makes advances to them in a way that indicates some form of mental and moral depravity, and his mushy proposals suggest a cross between a professional masher and a free lover, a free-verse poet of long-haired Bohemia rather than one of the country's lawmakers. Oklahoma ought to be and doubtless is ashamed of him. With the memory of Lafferty still fresh, Oregon can hardly taunt the State that sent HERRICK to Congress, but we can at least advise that the same fate be meted out to the latter as overtook the former.

I left Washington on the 30th day of June, 1922, to return to Oklahoma and did not get back until January 8, 1923, so during the time that I was absent from the city this actress hireling of these journalistic jackals, wolves, and hyenas could not hound nor harrass me.

Now, as a partial punishment of these slimy serpents who have been poisoning the Nation with their lies, libels, and slanders willfully and maliciously concocted by themselves for the purpose of serving their own vile ends, I ask that the rules be suspended and an immediate vote be taken upon House Resolution No. 515, expelling the representatives of these papers from the press gallery, lobby, cloakrooms, and corridors of the House.

If I have any time left, I yield it back to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report back Senate bill 3169 with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 3169, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ZIHLMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FENN, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COLE of Ohio, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 13835, the omnibus Indian appropriation bill, my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below.

S. 4235. An act granting consent of Congress to the Charlie Bridge Co. for construction of a bridge across Red River, between Clay County, Tex., and Cotton County, Okla.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4503. An act granting the consent of Congress to Bethlehem Steel Co. to construct a bridge across Humphreys Creek at or near the city of Sparrows Point, Md.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4522. An act authorizing the Secretary of State to convey certain land owned by the United States in Santiago, Chile, to the municipality of that city, and to acquire or receive in exchange therefor other land located in the said city; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11389. An act for the relief of Robert Guy Robinson;

H. R. 12887. An act granting a pension to Jacob F. Rosenberger;

H. R. 12007. An act providing for the conveyance of certain land to the city of Boise, Idaho, and from the city of Boise, Idaho, to the United States;

H. R. 6204. An act to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla, and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes;

H. R. 855. An act for the relief of Fred G. Leith, United States Navy;

H. R. 13046. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Wilmington, N. C., marine hospital reservation; and

H. R. 13760. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts," approved November 14, 1921.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 10211. An act authorizing an appropriation to meet proportionate expenses of providing a drainage system for Piute Indian lands in the State of Nevada within the Newlands reclamation project of the Reclamation Service.

H. R. 10817. An act to amend section 100 of the Judicial Code of the United States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provided for the taxation of incomes "from whatever source derived." This was understood to mean the taxation of incomes of public officials and also the taxation of the income derived from State and municipal bonds. There is no disputing the fact that this was the general belief when the amendment was discussed in Congress at the time it was approved and referred to the States. It was also the belief of the people of the States when the amendment was ratified by the legislatures of the several States. There is no reciprocity clause in the sixteenth amendment to permit the States to levy taxes on the income from Federal bonds. The sixteenth amendment is one sided in that respect. The sixteenth amendment was adopted because the American taxpayers believed then, as they believe now, that incomes should be taxed and that property should not bear an undue share of the public burdens. This belief is not a matter of party politics. It is a matter of common sense and a matter of fair dealing.

The first resolution providing for an amendment to authorize Congress to levy income taxes was introduced by Mr. Butler, of North Carolina, December 27, 1895. It was not until July 12, 1909, nearly 14 years later, that the resolution providing for the sixteenth amendment permitting Congress to tax "incomes from whatever source derived" finally passed Congress. During this period of nearly 14 years 39 resolutions were introduced for this purpose. The record shows that 35 of the 39 resolutions were introduced by Congressmen representing Democratic States and 4 were introduced by Congressmen representing Republican States. The record further shows that the amendment was ratified by the people of the Democratic States through their chosen representatives.

After the sixteenth amendment was duly ratified it was interpreted in an informal way which nullified a large part of its intended purpose by conceding that the incomes of public officials and the income derived from State and municipal bonds can not be taxed by Congress.

The sixteenth amendment was not adopted with the understanding that it would afford an avenue of escape from taxation for the wealthy holders of State and municipal bonds. Its intent was directly to the contrary.

The Green resolution, which has passed this House and which is now pending in the Senate, was presented for the purpose of correcting the weakness of the sixteenth amendment. It does not go so far as the sixteenth amendment was understood to go, and the pending resolution grants to the States important rights which were not granted in the sixteenth amendment previously ratified by the States.

At this time I desire to emphasize the fact that the Democrats who voted for the Green resolution have been true to the traditions of their party in favoring a square deal in taxation. They have stood by the record. As shown by the resolutions introduced, favoring an income tax, 35 to 4—about 10 to 1—the sentiment of the Democratic States is shown to be overwhelmingly for the Federal income tax. All parties ought to be unanimously for it now.

The remarkable development of sentiment in favor of the pending amendment, as compared with the advancement of other changes in the Constitution, is briefly shown in this synopsis.

For the sixteenth amendment (income tax) 39 resolutions were proposed. The first in 1895, and it was finally passed by Congress in 1909, nearly 14 years later.

For the seventeenth amendment (popular election of United States Senators) 191 resolutions were proposed; the first in 1826, and it was finally passed by Congress in 1912, 86 years later.

For the eighteenth amendment (prohibition) 58 resolutions were proposed; the first in 1876, and it finally passed Congress in 1917, 41 years later.

For the nineteenth amendment (woman suffrage) 105 resolutions were proposed, the first in 1868, and it finally passed Congress in 1919, 51 years later.

The first resolution proposing an amendment to make the language "from whatever source derived" mean what it says, as applied to the income from State and municipal bonds, as originally intended, was introduced by Mr. McFADDEN, of Pennsylvania, December 28, 1920. Resolutions on the same subject were subsequently introduced by Senator SMOOT, of Utah, Senator KELLOGG, of Minnesota, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Green resolution passed the House January 23, 1923, only 2 years and 26 days after the first resolution was introduced by Mr. McFADDEN.

The chronological history of the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth amendments has been carefully compiled by officials of the Congressional Library. It is a valuable contribution to current history on this important subject and I herewith submit it for publication:

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (157 U. S. 429, 158 U. S. 601), the Supreme Court, on May 20, 1895, declared the income-tax provision of the tariff act of 1894 unconstitutional. This at once led to a series of proposed amendments to the Constitution, which expressly gave Congress the right to levy income taxes without any reference to their apportionment among the States. The following table indicates the progress of this movement:

7281. By Mr. KISSEL: Memorial to the Legislature of the State of Oregon, relating to the Federal income tax act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7282. Also, petition of the Citizens' Medical Reference Bureau New York City, N. Y., relating to the vaccination law in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

7283. By Mr. LEA of California: Petition of 15 residents of Chico, Calif., to abolish discriminatory tax on small-arms ammunition and firearms; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7284. By Mr. LUCE: Petition of the Massachusetts Federation of Churches, urging amendment of the Constitution to give Federal Government the power to regulate child labor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

7285. By Mr. ROUSE: Petition of sundry citizens of Kentucky, favoring legislation extending aid to people of German and Austrian Republics; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

7286. By Mr. SNYDER: Petition of J. J. McLoughlin and 41 others, favoring the abolishment of the tax on small arms and ammunition; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

7287. By Mr. TINKHAM: Petition of the International Typographical Union, protesting against the passage of the ship subsidy bill; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1923.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, we thank Thee that Thou hast consideration for our needs. For all the blessings of life we return to Thee thanks this morning. As we look out upon a world in need we know Thou canst meet every necessity. Amidst all the turmoil give unto us rest and quiet in Thyself, and an understanding of the times, and how best to meet the manifold issues presented. Give wisdom this morning and help in all the deliberations of the hour, to the glory of Thy great name. Through Jesus Christ. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., February 13, 1923.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MOSES thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McNary	Shortridge
Ball	Gooding	Moses	Smith
Bayard	Harreld	Nelson	Smoot

Dial	Lodge	Ransdell	Watson
Dillingham	McCormick	Reed, Mo.	*Willis
Fletcher	McCumber	Robinson
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Sheppard
George	McLean	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 3169) to equalize pensions of retired policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 418) authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, District of Columbia, 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer [Mr. MOSES] as Acting President pro tempore:

H. R. 5224. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to certify to the Secretary of the Interior, for restoration to the public domain, lands in the State of Louisiana not needed for naval purposes;

H. R. 13046. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Wilmington, N. C., marine hospital reservation; and

H. R. 13760. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts," approved November 14, 1921.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. MOSES] laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A concurrent resolution.

Whereas South Dakota is almost wholly dependent upon agriculture, and consequently the market for agricultural products is of prime importance in our affairs; and

Whereas water transportation will reduce the cost of the carriage of wheat to the seaboard no less than 7 cents per bushel and proportionately upon other cereals, a saving that would add many millions to the market value of the products of our farms, to say nothing of the reduced cost of merchandise by reason of bringing the seaboard to the interior; and

Whereas the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway will bring South Dakota 2,000 miles nearer to the Atlantic and European markets and will result in substantial advantage to our markets and the consequent improvement to agricultural conditions and the general prosperity of the people: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of South Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it hereby is, memorialized and petitioned to promptly take such action as will result in immediate development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway: Be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Secretary of the Senate and Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to His Excellency the President of the United States, Warren G. Harding.

CARL GUNDERSON,
President of the Senate.
A. B. BLAKE,
Secretary of the Senate.
E. O. FRESCOLN,
Speaker of the House.
WRIGHT TARBELL,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate radio broadcasting, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of the Framingham Central Labor Union and the Buildings Trades Council, both of Framingham, and Local Union No. 6, United Hatters of North America, of Boston, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called ship subsidy bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GOODING, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 4478) to promote agriculture by stabilizing the price of wheat, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1141) thereon.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13880) for the reorganization and improvement of the foreign service of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1142) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 4536) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Peedee River in South Carolina; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4537) for the relief of George Turner (with the accompanying papers); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4538) granting a pension to Minnie L. Foster (with the accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4539) granting a pension to Clarissa A. Grover (with the accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH:

A bill (S. 4540) to authorize the building of a bridge across the Peedee River, S. C.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 4541) for the relief of Thomas N. Emley and Ida E. Godfrey; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4542) relative to the claim of the Export Oil Corporation (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 4543) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4544) to authorize the extension of the period of restriction against alienation on surplus lands allotted to minor members of the Kansas or Kaw Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 4545) to amend section 14 of the military services act, approved June 10, 1922; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROUSSARD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 279) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan 3,000 wooden folding chairs for the use of the United Confederate Veterans at their reunion to be held in New Orleans, La., on April 11, 12, and 13, 1923; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SHIPPING BOARD DATA.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit a Senate resolution calling for certain information from the United States Shipping Board. I may state that on January 23 I presented a resolution and a response came under date of February 5. That related to ships which were sold since March 4, 1921. The resolution which I am now offering relates to ships which were sold on or before that date. I ask that the resolution may be acted upon.

The resolution (S. Res. 440) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Shipping Board be, and it is hereby, directed and instructed to furnish to the United States Senate the following detailed information:

First. State number of ships sold by the United States Shipping Board on or before March 4, 1921.

Second. Give the names of persons, partnerships, or corporations to whom said sales have been made.

Third. Give the terms of the sale, whether for cash or on deferred payments, and the amount of each, with dates of maturity of deferred payments.

Fourth. Give in detail what settlements, if any, have been made for each of said ships so sold with said persons, partnerships, or corporations.

Fifth. If there has been any difference in the said terms of settlements, give the reasons therefor.

Sixth. If settlements have not been made in accordance with terms of sale by any of said persons, partnerships, or corporations, give the reasons therefor.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 418. A joint resolution authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia, and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BOARD OF ACCOUNTANCY FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which were, on page 3, line 13, after "education," to insert "or who, in the opinion of the board, has had sufficient commercial experience in accounting"; on page 6, line 21, after "compensation," to insert "for actual time employed"; and, on page 6, line 22, after "determine," to insert "and the remaining surplus, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia."

Mr. BALL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN PRESIDENTIAL AND CONGRESSIONAL TERMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 253) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote. It is the joint resolution which I moved to take up on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there seemed on yesterday to be a sort of tacit understanding that there would be no opposition to the joint resolution as it is proposed to be modified and that we should be able to pass it during the morning hour. I wish to call attention to a mistake which I made on yesterday in the manner in which I then proposed to modify the joint resolution. I stated that the proposition was to strike out all of section 1, but I only proposed to strike out that part of section 1 pertaining to the election of President and Vice President. When thus amended there will be but little of the joint resolution left, and it will provide that the terms of President and Vice President shall commence at noon on the third Monday in January following their election; that the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election; that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and that such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January, unless otherwise a different day shall be appointed by Congress; that the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress who may be in office at the time that the proposed constitutional amendment shall take effect shall expire, in the case of the President and Vice President on the third Monday in January instead of on the 4th of March, and in the case of Members of Congress on the first Monday in January instead of on the 4th of March.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. It will be observed that the commencement of the term of President and Vice President is two weeks subsequent to the commencement of the term of Members of Congress. The idea is to give Congress ample time to organize and to canvass the votes for President and Vice President, which, under the Constitution, it must do. I do not think it would be an insuperable objection if the terms of all these officers commenced on the same day; but if the joint resolution shall be adopted unamended, it will make a difference of two weeks in the time of the commencement of their terms and would give time to Congress to meet and for each body to organize before they held their joint session.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORRIS. I first promised to yield to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and after I shall have done so I shall then gladly yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand, the only change in the joint resolution as now proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, as compared to the modification which he proposed on yesterday, relates to the term of President and Vice President?

Mr. NORRIS. No. It relates to the method of the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think the Senator understood my question.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that I did not.

Mr. ROBINSON. On yesterday the Senator from Nebraska announced that it was his purpose so to modify the joint resolution as to omit all provisions relating to the election of President and Vice President, so as to confine the joint resolution solely to the terms of Senators and Representatives and the time when Congress shall assemble.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand it is proposed by the Senator from Nebraska also to make the joint resolution applicable to the terms of President and Vice President?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. And to make their terms begin on the third Monday in January following their election instead of on the 4th of March as at present?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator now proposes the joint resolution in a form that will require the old Congress, to wit, the Congress sitting when the election may be held, to pass upon the election?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; that would not be the effect of it. The Senator will observe that the new Congress will meet on the first Monday in January——

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And that the President will not be inaugurated until the third Monday in January.

Mr. ROBINSON. So that the proposal is that the new Congress shall have ample time to pass upon the matter before the time for the inauguration of the new President arrives?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I was about to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question relative to the last clause of his joint resolution, which would seem to cut short the term of the President who may occupy the office at the time the proposed amendment would go into effect. Is that correct?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and it would also shorten the terms of Members of Congress.

Mr. WARREN. As to the President, would not the amendment, if it were ratified, infringe on the President's vested right to his office under his election in pursuance of the Constitution?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so far as the change of the Constitution is concerned there could be no objection made on the ground of the curtailing of any vested right under the Constitution.

Mr. WARREN. I am not a lawyer, as is the Senator from Nebraska, and I wish to know if a change in the Constitution can be made to operate retroactively?

Mr. NORRIS. No; a change in the Constitution, however, may be made, I think, so as entirely to abolish a constitutional office, the same as may be done by a change of law.

Mr. WARREN. There is no doubt about that; but the Constitution limits the term of the President to four years, and the four years end on the 4th of March. It is now proposed that the presidential term shall end on the first Monday in January, and that the successor of the President shall then take the place of the incumbent of the office. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see any legal objection to that. Of course, the ratification of the constitutional amendment would shorten the term of whoever happened to be President, the same as it would, by a couple of months, shorten the term of whoever happened to be Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives whose terms expired on the 4th of March.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has practically asked the question that I was about to ask; that is, whether it was the intent to shorten the terms of those who had been elected under the Constitution as it now stands, and whether there ought not to be some provision so that at least the terms of those who are elected prior to the adoption of any new provision in the Constitution shall expire at the time now fixed under the present Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. We shall, by some method, have to change the term of office, because if a man is elected before the proposed constitutional amendment goes into effect his term of office does not commence until the 4th of March; if it shall go into effect while he is in office his term would have to be shortened; but it would only be by a couple of months.

Mr. McCUMBER. To be sure, but it could be provided in the proposed amendment that those who were elected prior to the change of the Constitution should serve until the expiration of their terms. Then those who would be elected subsequently, of course, would serve in their initial term for two months less.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would seem to be the fairer and better way.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us see how that would work. That would be one way of solving the difficulty.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment. If we did that there would be somebody, for instance in the House of Representatives, elected for two years whose term would be shortened; somebody's term must be shortened, either the man who is in office or the man who is elected; there will be one term in the House of Representatives which will be shortened about two months.

Mr. McCUMBER. That should be the term of the newly elected Representative.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, there is no trouble about that; but those who have already been elected for a certain term have, it might be said, what is in the nature of a contract between them and the people of the United States who elected them under the Constitution. While I agree with the Senator that we should bring about in some manner this change, and I favor it, it looks to me as though in that particular situation it would be necessary to make some different provision for those who have been elected and are holding office.

Mr. NORRIS. There can not be any question about the proposal as a matter of law. The courts have always held, for instance, that a legislative office may be absolutely abolished by the legislature which established it and which has constitutional jurisdiction. Whoever is in office goes out when the office is abolished. That has been a common occurrence. On the other hand, a constitutional office by amendment of the Constitution may be entirely abolished; and it will be just as long as it is short in this case, because if we do not shorten the term of the man who happens to be in office we will have to shorten the term of the man who succeeds him. I myself do not care in which way it is worked out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct as to our right to take such action, but could we not meet the difficulty that has been suggested by providing that the proposed constitutional amendment shall take effect after the election of the first President who may be elected under it, so that the President in office will not have his term shortened, but that the proposed change in the Constitution shall apply to the next President who is elected under it?

Mr. NORRIS. We could do that, instead of adopting the provision I have placed in the joint resolution, and, if the Senate thinks that is a proper way to proceed, of course, I myself would not object, although I do not see anything wrong about it as it now stands, because the man who has been elected to office has not any contract with the Government such as a man has who makes a civil contract with another.

Mr. WARREN. But he has rights under the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he has not any right to continue in office if the office is abolished. Now, let us see what would happen.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator abolish the office of President?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in a moment. I should like to say a few words myself. Suppose we adopt the constitutional amendment and it is also adopted by the House and goes to the legislatures of the various States, everyone in the country will know that it is pending.

If an election occurs while it is pending and before it is ratified by a sufficient number of States to make it a part of the Constitution, candidates at that election know that, perhaps, the action of only two more States is required to make the proposed constitutional amendment effective; they understand that; everybody understands it; candidates are making their campaign on the strength of it. If it happens to be a presidential election—and it is not likely to be—candidates for President will understand that their term of office may be, instead of four years, about six weeks less than four years. No advantage will be taken of anybody. There is not anything under cover. It is all understood, and everybody knows what is going to happen, and they will make their campaign on that theory. If there are only a few legislatures left on the 7th of November, a year from next November, when we hold the election, every candidate, from President down, will know that the probabilities are that some time following the election, when the legislatures convene again, perhaps in February, March, or April, there will be an approval of this amendment, and thereby the term for which those men were elected, although they knew it when they were elected, will be shortened a month or two.

I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that if it should happen that this amendment should be approved at once in sufficient number by the legislatures that are now in session—which I do not anticipate; nobody does, I think; it would be too much to expect—it would be in effect before the expiration of the present terms, and I would be one of those who would have his term cut short. I do not myself see any objection to it, because if we ever bring about this reform in this way we must shorten somebody's term of office.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I agree entirely with the Senator as to the Members of Congress, and so forth; but unless perhaps the Senator expects that the term of a Senator will expire before we shall be at work under this amendment, I think after a President has been elected for four years and duly installed, if we undertake to legislate him out of office we are going beyond what we have a right to do. I understand the Senator's remarks about shortening the term of a Senator. That is perfectly all right. A man, before he is elected, goes in knowing that his term is to be shortened.

Mr. NORRIS. The matter can be changed as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I think that suggestion is a good one, and I think it ought to be done. If the Senator wishes to put it into effect, I think an amendment of that kind should be made.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us see, first, if there is any objection to the amendment that I want to propose, striking out the last part of the section.

Mr. President, in accordance with the understanding that I outlined yesterday, I move to amend the joint resolution as follows: Commencing on page 1, line 11, after the word "election," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the balance of the section, namely, all down to and including line 17, on page 3.

I should like to have the Secretary state the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I wish it might be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the word "election," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of section 1, or all down to and including the words "United States," on line 17, page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I have not anything further to say, unless some Senator wishes to ask me some question. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr LA FOLLETTE] rose awhile ago. Does he desire to interrogate me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, taking section 2, which reads:

> That the terms of Senators and Representatives shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election—

What objection would there be to an amendment to that which would make it read—

> That the terms of Senators and Representatives elected after the adoption of this amendment shall commence on the first Monday in January following their election?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I will not offer any objection if the Senator offers that amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that ought to apply to all of them.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, if it is desired to carry out the idea that has been suggested, that ought to be offered; and the same amendment ought to apply to article 1, in regard to the President and Vice President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator to wait until the Senator from North Dakota concludes his suggestion. Does the Senator desire to offer that amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I desire to offer it as to both matters.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it ought to be offered at both places.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator accept it?

Mr. NORRIS. I will not object to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment so that in section 2, after the word "Representatives"——

Mr. NORRIS. Let us commence at the beginning first. Let us take the President first.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am reading from a different print.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I had better offer it from this one. The Secretary has the same print that I have.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On line 10, page 1, after the words "United States," I move to insert "elected after the adoption of this article."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the words "United States," insert a comma and the words "elected after the adoption of this article."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, on page 3, after line 17, I move to insert the same language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, at the end of line 18, after the word "Representatives," insert a comma and the words "elected after the adoption of this article."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, with those amendments in, I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that we ought to strike out section 4. We have corrected the joint resolution now so that that will be absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to strike out section 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the word "article" just inserted as an amendment should not be "amendment"?

Mr. NORRIS. I supposed it was "amendment."

Mr. LODGE. It ought to be "amendment."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is the way I intended to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the correction will be made.

Mr. LODGE. Also, Mr. President, at the proper time, which is not now, we ought to correct the title by striking out the words "and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; we will have to.

Mr. LODGE. That comes later. That is an amendment to the title.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not in order now. That will have to come after the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Do I understand that this amendment changes the length of term of the President and Vice President?

Mr. NORRIS. No; their term is four years; just the same.

Mr. President, I do not know of anything else, unless some other Senator has a question to ask.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, let the amendments so far agreed to be read.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	McCumber	Ransdell
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Reed, Mo.
Bayard	George	McKinley	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume we must have a record vote on the passage of the joint resolution, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALDER. I ask that the joint resolution be read as amended.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would like to have the joint resolution reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution as amended.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As amended, the joint resolution reads as follows, after the resolving clause:

SECTION 1. That the terms of the President and Vice President of the United States elected after the adoption of this amendment shall commence at noon on the third Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 2. That the terms of Senators and Representatives elected after the adoption of this amendment shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 3. That the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meetings shall be on the first Monday in January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? The Senator from Nebraska demands the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I think they are necessary under the circumstances.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCORMICK (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who, if present, would vote as I purpose to vote, and therefore I vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). My pair, the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BAYARD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Has the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). He has not voted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have a general pair with that Senator. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and being unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH. My pair, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], not being present, and being unable to ascertain just how he would vote or to get a transfer I withhold my vote. If allowed to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHIELDS (after having voted in the negative). Not noticing the absence of my pair, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], when my name was called, I voted. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The roll call resulted—yeas 63, nays 6, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the passage of the joint resolution the yeas are 63, the nays are 6. Two-thirds of the Senators present and voting having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to amend the title.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the joint resolution we have just passed reads as follows:

SECTION 1. That the terms of the President and Vice President of the United States elected after the adoption of this amendment shall commence at noon on the third Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 2. That the terms of Senators and Representatives elected after the adoption of this amendment shall commence at noon on the first Monday in January following their election.

SEC. 3. That the Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meetings shall be on the first Monday in January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

It was my intention to offer an amendment to this proposed constitutional amendment so that hereafter upon all constitutional amendments a referendum should be had to the people of each State, but as the Committee on the Judiciary is now holding hearings upon that particular subject and doubtless will report a resolution to that purpose and effect, I shall be obliged to content myself by awaiting the action of that committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there is something new under the sun. This will be the first amendment ever submitted, if the joint resolution shall be agreed to by the House, that originated in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and not in the Committee on the Judiciary.

I introduced a concurrent resolution providing that Senators and Representatives who had been defeated or who had not stood for reelection should refrain from voting upon material legislation after the election and before the expiration of their terms. That resolution, of course, as everyone knew, rightfully belonged in the Committee on the Judiciary. I so announced it when I offered it, but asked unanimous consent that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and it went to that committee. A proposed constitutional amendment came back in its stead, striking out my resolution and incorporating a joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution. I am glad it has passed. I want to utter a word of explanation.

I introduced the resolution, and I tried to say then, and I wish to repeat, that it was no expression of discourtesy or lack of confidence in the Members of the Senate and House who are about to retire. They are men of high character. But it was then known, and it is now known, that the principal administration measure before the Senate—the ship subsidy bill—could not be passed if the new Congress were permitted to vote upon the measure. The expiring Congress was called into extraordinary session in order to hasten that measure. And to emphasize that fact I introduced the resolution. I was conscious that Congress had no power to deprive a Representative or a Senator of his right to vote upon any measure that might be submitted to his branch of Congress during his term of office. The resolution did not seek to deprive him of it. It expressed the sense of the Congress that he should refrain from seeking to fasten upon the American people a measure the people in the recent election had repudiated. It emphasized that fact, and it hastened, I believe all will agree, the vote upon the proposed constitutional amendment. Without my resolution the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry could not have reported the joint resolution, and the Senate to-day could not have voted upon it.

I hope that it does more than that. I hope it will cause the administration to pause in its drive to fasten upon the American people during this Congress a measure which the President of these United States and every Member of the Senate knows would not be adopted if the Congress elected when that measure was before the people should be permitted to pass upon the question.

It seems to me there should be a sense of duty to the American people that ought to imbue public officials, the President most of all, with a respect for what the people have declared is their wish.

We hear much about the mandate of the election of 1920 to keep out of Europe. They want to respect that mandate, and yet as to one held two years later touching a material domestic policy, the President has said he "hoped Congress would not regard an ill-considered public opinion expressed in the last election." In other words, "Disregard the wishes of the people whose representative you are, and listen to me. I have the power yet to reward you if you are unfaithful to the people and if you respect my wish as I have ascertained what my wish is through Mr. Lasker, the chairman of the Shipping Board."

I know there is not a man on the floor of the Senate who will not agree with me that if only Members who are to hold their commissions in the Sixty-eighth Congress should vote upon it the measure would not pass. If a unanimous-consent agreement should be submitted that only those who are to be Members of the Sixty-eighth Congress shall vote upon the ship subsidy, we might have a vote on that shipping bill before to-night. Now, why, then, should those who pretend they want the shipping bill and who contend that the people want it refuse to agree to that suggestion?

I want to say again that I am not questioning the high character of those who go out of the Senate. Those we lost on this side are as shining lights in the public councils of the Nation, and we shall be the poorer by their going. Those gentlemen on the other side who go out are men also of high character; I am not questioning that; but we have just recorded our conviction that the organic law ought to be so amended that hereafter no repudiated Congress may come back and fasten upon the people legislation that the people have tried to avoid.

Here, Mr. President, is what I wish to say: If the measure is of such transcendent importance that the organic law of this Nation should be amended so as to make such a situation impossible to happen in the future, is it not of such importance that we might respect it now? Shall we insist that the Constitution shall be amended to prevent a thing that we know is about to happen, and yet pay no attention to the evil we seek to cure? That is the question which I wish to emphasize. Mr. President, if the Constitution ought to be amended so that a repudiated Congress can not come back and legislate, why should we not respect the will of the people as recorded by a substantial majority on the 7th day of November last and lay aside the shipping bill? There would be no occasion to revive it, for the next Congress would not pass it. Why? Because the people elected that Congress with the issue before them, and the Members of that Congress will know the people oppose it.

Another thing, Mr. President: The very Senator—and I have very great respect for him—who is seeking to drive that measure through the Senate was the author of a shipping bill two years ago. He was just as certain then that he had solved the problem of an American merchant marine as he now is. The President of the United States, who was then a Senator, was sure that was the measure to solve the American shipping problem, and he made a speech in its favor. That bill provided that when commercial treaties and conventions were abrogated, we could discriminate in favor of American merchant ships in the transportation of products to be imported into this country and thereby assure an American merchant marine. Why does not the President, then, under that law do what that law required the President to do? When a Senator he voted for it. The law required the President to negotiate new commercial treaties and to denounce existing treaties. Then, why does not the President obey the law of the land, for which he himself voted, and denounce these commercial treaties and conventions and give us the possibility of establishing a merchant marine, as he said when he was a Senator two years ago it would insure an American merchant marine?

I think he might take counsel of his own wisdom when he was a Senator, for I think he showed a great deal more wisdom as a Senator than he has shown as the President of these United States. I think he was a very much better Senator than he has been a President. However, I think there were plenty of Senators here then who were as wise as was the President when he was a Senator; and I am not overly complimentary of the Senate, either. I do not want anybody to think I am indulging in flattery of the Senate.

Mr. President, I am going to call attention to this matter again shortly. I merely wish, while the Senate is so busy proposing to amend the Constitution or to facilitate its amendment in order to prevent happening in the future what they have the power to prevent happening right now, to see if they are as courageous to correct an evil which they have the power to correct as they are now insistent that the Constitution shall be amended to prevent some other Senate from doing in the future.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Speaking about the President's relation to the Senate, if we may at all judge by what the newspapers are stating, the President does not seem to have much respect for the Senate or the House of Representatives or this whole aggregation down here. In the News of yesterday—I do not know whether this is true or not but there must be something to it, because it has been carried in various newspapers, including a notice in the Washington Post of Sunday bearing on the same subject—there is this specific statement:

Harding foils "pork bill." Won't allow Weeks to spend money appropriated. President Harding, in an effort to prevent spending the $30,000,000 appropriation for rivers and harbors, which, although not provided in the Budget, was attached to the Army appropriation bill, has ordered—

Has ordered—

Secretary Weeks to spend only the amount provided in the Budget.

The remainder, the appropriation of which raised a great cry of "pork," is to accrue in the Treasury.

Congressional leaders who have been expecting to see Harding bow regularly to their will are perplexed.

I do not know, of course, whether or not that is true; I am simply referring to it as having been stated in the press so emphatically that the President will assume to say to the Secretary of War what part of the appropriation which has been made by Congress shall be spent and what part shall not be spent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, there is no question but the President said it. Of course, the President, as Senators know, will refine upon what he said until possibly we shall never know what he meant. The President has already explained what he said, but his explanation is as obscure as is the statement which he sought to explain. There is not any question but the President gave out an interview which all understood to be a declaration that he would substitute his own judgment for the expressed will of Congress and permit the expenditure of money in river and harbor improvements only on those projects which he himself should approve. I have an idea—and I do not mind "tipping off" my friends here—that if one has a project that he is particularly anxious about he would do well to vote for the British debt settlement and for the ship subsidy in order that he may stand well when he goes down to the department to have his river project approved by the President. I rather imagine that the President's statement is going to get some votes for the ship subsidy bill. I am rather inclined to suspect that the President hastened to give us that statement in advance of his having an opportunity to examine the Army appropriation bill, in which the river and harbor appropriations are carried, in order that he might influence the Congress into accepting his judgment.

Oh, Mr. President, the President said in his address to the joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress that we must hasten this British debt settlement; that in it was peace or war; that if we should approve it peace would smile upon the earth, while if we should disapprove it the shadow of war would hover over all the world. Nobody ever heard of it being a peace or war measure before; but the President, in his imagination, drew that picture, that in approving or disapproving it we were either voting for peace or war.

War threatens now, Mr. President; and yet, with this message of peace before the Senate, the President of these United States is not willing for that measure to be considered until the Congress shall record its submission to the President and to Mr. Lasker by voting for the shipping bill. Could it be possible that the President sincerely believes that the approval of the British debt settlement means peace or that its rejection means war, and is then willing to thrust the shipping program into the controversy and risk imperiling the peace of the world in order that he may enable Mr. Lasker to turn over the American fleet to his friends and business associates? That is the logic of his position.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire at this time to place in the RECORD a statement relative to the subject of the speech just made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. I read from to-day's New York World an editorial headed "Mr. Harding's Gamble":

Last Wednesday Mr. Harding told Congress that the British debt settlement is "a recommitment of the English-speaking world to the validity of contract"; that "it is in effect a plight against war and war expenditures"; that "it is a covenant of peace and recuperation"; that it is "a covenant of peace no less effective than it would be if joint British and American opposition to war were expressly agreed on."

To make sure that he was placing sufficient emphasis on the supreme importance of this transaction, the President further informed Congress that "the failure of the British undertaking would have spread political and economic discouragement throughout the world, and general repudiation would have likely followed in its wake."

It is now evident that the earnestness that Mr. Harding displayed in his address to Congress was sheer affectation. He did not believe what he said. No sooner did the Senate take steps to insure an early vote on the debt settlement than the President intervened. He objects to having his ship-subsidy bill displaced on the calendar. He insists that it must be pressed to a vote and the debt settlement must wait. When he talks to Congress the debt settlement is vital. When he talks with the Republican leaders the subsidy must have the right of way.

Nobody has ever satisfactorily analyzed Mr. Harding's mental processes, and it is unlikely that anybody ever will. There are no data on which to arrive at an understanding of a President who describes the British debt settlement as "a covenant of peace" and then promptly drags a discredited ship-subsidy bill across the trail.

If Mr. Harding had believed the assertions that he made in his address he would have unhesitatingly sacrificed a score of ship-subsidy bills in order to get the immediate acquiescence of the Senate to the British debt settlement. He would have regarded everything else as so trivial in comparison that he would have permitted nothing to stand in the way. What he actually does, however, is to push his ship-subsidy legislation ahead of the debt settlement and gamble against a parliamentary deadlock.

Mr. Harding's infatuation for a ship subsidy is quite beyond explanation. It excludes everything else from his thoughts. He called Congress back into special session in November to pass it and learned nothing whatever from his failure. He is still confident that somehow and in some way the lame ducks in the Senate who are now dependent on him for further emoluments of office will manage to push it through for him, and the Treasury will be committed for the next 15 years to hundreds of millions of expenditure for the enrichment of favored interests.

The fact that the November elections disclosed no sentiment in favor of the subsidy and a very aggressive sentiment against it only increases the President's determination. He has his packed jury of defeated Republican Senators now; he will have no packed jury after March 4, and so he bends all his energies to the task of obtaining a verdict from a jury that has no moral right to sit in the case. What would Mr. Harding have said as Senator if Mr. Wilson had ever been guilty of such astounding folly?

Mr. President, I commend this editorial to all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to amend the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to modify my motion by not only striking out the words "and providing for the election of President and Vice President by direct vote" but by inserting in lieu of the words stricken out the words "and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress." May I suggest to Senators I hope they will not debate the motion I have made, because at 1 o'clock the joint resolution, although we have passed it, will go to the calendar? There can be no objection, of course, to amending the title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to amend the title of the joint resolution as he suggests.

The motion was agreed to.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the foreign debt funding bill, being House bill 14254.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14254. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota whether it is his purpose when the hour of 1 o'clock arrives to insist upon continuing the consideration of the measure which he seeks to have laid before the Senate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would be glad if that could be done, but that, of course, is subject to the will of the Senate itself.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say to the Senator that there will be a request for unanimous consent that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside in order that the debt funding bill may be continued to be discussed.

Mr. KING. Why not make a motion at 1 o'clock to that effect?

Mr. SMOOT. Such a motion can not be made now.

Mr. KING. Why not make a motion at that time to consider the debt funding bill and to supersede the subsidy bill so as to give the debt funding bill the right of way?

Mr. LODGE. That motion can not be made now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Utah that such a motion can not be entertained now.

Mr. KING. Of course it may not be entertained now, but I was seeking to anticipate what our friends upon the other side will do when 1 o'clock arrives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I will not object, but I hope the motion will be made at 1 o'clock to proceed with the consideration of the debt funding bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. With the understanding that the text of the bill shall be read for committee amendments, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senate that I have prepared a short statement of justification for the action of the commission which will require about a half hour. I want to complete the statement, if I may be allowed to do so without interruption, lest at the end of that time we might take up another bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. We ought to take up this matter with a good attendance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	George	McCumber	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to present my justification of the bill before the Senate in the fewest possible words and in as logical a manner as I may be able to present it; and I therefore ask that I may proceed without interruption until I have completed the statement.

Mr. President, the most momentous question ever presented to the American people since the Civil War was that presented on the 6th day of April, 1917. On that day, by an overwhelming vote, both branches of Congress declared that instead of continuing to reap the immense benefits in treasure that were pouring into our coffers from the struggling, bleeding belligerents in that terrible conflict we should ourselves enter the war and expend both our blood and our treasure. That decision has cost us, I think, more than forty billions of dollars, twenty-three billions of which is still represented by bonded indebtedness.

Second in importance to that declaration of war is the bill now before the Senate to validate a settlement between the commissioners of this country and those of Great Britain, which funds an indebtedness of over four and a half billions of dollars and assures the payment of both principal and interest, which, if not sooner liquidated, will by the end of the period given for redemption amount to more than $11,000,000,000.

This first settlement of foreign indebtedness due the United States is important in bringing into our Treasury the interest due us from Great Britain, the principal debtor nation, not only in that it will exercise a tremendous influence in the stabilizing of world conditions but that it will be a lesson, if not an inspiration, to other debtor nations to come forward and set the seal of national approval upon their several debts and thereby in the end secure the liquidation of every dollar of indebtedness due us.

Mr. President, national repudiation of international obligations is the greatest blow to civilization that any country on the face of the earth at the present time, when all conditions are so uncertain and so chaotic, could give to a bewildered world. When national honor and integrity can no longer be relied upon, to what haven of safety is it possible for the individual to turn?

The greatest help any nation could give to civilization and to financial and economic stability to-day would be to acknowledge and fund its indebtedness; and, Mr. President, may I add right here that the greatest assistance which the United States, the creditor nation of the world, could bestow upon the present distracted world would be to recognize the dire distress of her debtors and show them the utmost leniency in the matter of maturity and rate of interest, bringing the settlement with each debtor nation within the ability of such nation to meet, recognizing that its budget must necessarily first provide for its national life.

LAW AUTHORIZING COMMISSION.

Mr. President, when the matter of creating a commission to settle our foreign credits was before the Committee on Finance the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, realizing the financial and economic conditions then prevailing in Europe, asked that the commission to be created be given such discretion in the matter of rates of interest and time of payment as would enable it to make settlement with each one of the debtor nations according to the special situation of such nation. I most earnestly concurred in that view. The majority of the committee, however, took the position that we should give no such unbounded power to the commission. The real reason which seemed to pervade the minds of the majority of the committee was not that any nation could proceed forthwith to pay interest upon its obligations and could provide for the payment within 25 years but, by thus declaring by law, it would be necessary for the commission to bring each settlement with each country before Congress for its acceptance; and, Mr. President, this has been the effect and result of that law. This is why it is necessary to have congressional approval of the settlement made by the commission.

By the law enacted on February 9, 1922, it was provided "that nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or other obligations due the United States of America by any foreign government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4¼ per cent per annum."

The commission finding it impossible to refund the British obligations on that basis, and taking into consideration the financial and economic conditions of Great Britain at the present time, agreed to a settlement as follows:

Interest on all obligations of Great Britain was computed at 4¼ per cent per annum up to the 15th day of December, 1922. This accrued interest was added to the principal. Then there were deducted therefrom two payments made by Great Britain aggregating $100,000,000, with like interest up to December 15, 1922. This left a total indebtedness due from Great Britain to the United States on that date of $4,604,128,085.74. Of this sum $4,128,085.74 was to be paid in cash, leaving a balance of $4,600,000,000 of principal, for which the British Government is to give its bonds, the principal to be paid in installments on a fixed schedule, the installments to increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds, which may run for a period of 62 years, the interest rate to be 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent thereafter. The first year's installment on principal will be $23,000,000. If the payments run the full 62 years, the last installment will be $175,000,000.

I ask here to insert a table which will show the annual installments during the full period of time. Of course, provision is made for payment before due.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Statement of amounts payable to the United States on account of the proposed refunding bonds to be issued by Great Britain.

Year.	Principal.	Schedule of annual interest installments to be paid by British Government on refunding bonds at rate of 3 per cent for first 10 years, 3½ per cent until final payment.	Schedule of annual principal installments to be paid on account of principal.	Total annual payments.

REASONS FOR EXTENDING TIME OF PAYMENT AND REDUCING INTEREST.

Mr. McCUMBER. Eliminating from our consideration every element of leniency which would influence a humane creditor in dealing with a hard-pressed debtor, it may be said that these were the very best terms that could be secured by the commission. They could either allow the indebtedness to remain in statu quo with no agreed date at which principal or interest would be paid, or they could accept a proposition that would immediately begin to bring into the Treasury of the United States interest upon the full obligation at a good, fair rate and assure the payment of the principal in ever-increasing amounts until the same should be fully liquidated. We all know that when a country like Great Britain executes her bonds with interest payable at specified times, and which interest becomes a component part of the budget of that nation, she is going to meet it and meet it promptly, as every great nation must meet its obligations.

The interest charges agreed upon are fully up to and somewhat beyond the rates generally carried in long-time interest-bearing obligations of the great countries of the world.

Of course, being the creditor nation and having a large debt already due and unpaid, we had the power to say to the British nation, "We will not extend this debt unless we have at least 4½ per cent interest." We, of course, could have said that, but we could not have gotten a settlement upon that basis. The debtor Government came forward and said to us, "We will pay you every cent that we have borrowed. We will pay you as high a rate of interest or a higher rate than we have ever in times of peace paid on long-time obligations. All we ask of you is that you will give us such time and such rates of interest as will, with our taxing power already pressed to nearly the utmost that our people can possibly bear, enable us to meet the obligations and meet them promptly."

We might have demanded the "pound of flesh," but it would have been a demand only. We are not going to war with any people, we are not going to attempt to enslave a people, to collect a debt. We are not going to imitate the Ruhr invasion to enforce a financial obligation.

And right here, and as bearing directly upon the rate of interest we ought to charge, let us not forget this most important element of the loan we are by this act funding. We did not place the $4,000,000,000 loaned to Great Britain in her hands and tell her to buy her goods where she could buy them the cheapest. We said, "We will give you a credit of $4,000,000,000 provided you will purchase the articles you shall need in this war from our merchants and manufacturers."

Not a dollar of this loan was paid in cash. It was all spent in the purchase of goods in the United States. These goods were purchased at enormous prices, giving enormous profits to our people. Not only was this $4,000,000,000 thus expended, but in addition thereto Great Britain paid in cash another $3,000,000,000 for like purchases, making a total of $7,000,000,000, on all of which we realized very great profits. The Government in turn said to our people concerning most of these purchases, "We will allow you any profits you may demand for the sale of your goods to foreign countries, but we will compel you to divide those immense profits with the Government under the provisions of our income, normal and surtax, our excise, profits, and excess profits tax laws." And so a very large part of this so-called loan of money, which was a mere credit, came back into the American Treasury and enabled us to become thereby the creditor nation of the world.

Recalling these immense profits to our people, and remembering the many hundreds of millions of dollars out of these profits which immediately went back into the Treasury of the United States, I say that we not only can with good grace, but in my opinion we should be most lenient in the matter of interest rates and time of payment of the principal.

ECONOMIC CONDITION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Neither ought we at this time to fail to take cognizance of the economic condition of our debtors. A published statement but a very short time ago coming from Mr. Law himself, as I remember, was to the effect that Great Britain is now paying out $500,000,000 a year to support her unemployed hundreds of thousands. That of itself speaks of an economic distress that no words can adequately pen.

Neither should we forget the terrible consequences of this war to the British Empire and especially to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Hers are to-day the most heavily taxed people on the face of the earth. Nearly 1,000,000 of the manhood of the country are either sleeping under the poppies of Flanders, the lilies of France, or under the waves of the ocean. Add to that, say, double the number in maimed and dependent, and we begin to realize the heavy burden which that country must bear for many years. Her losses in ships during that war were 2,479 in number, and of a tonnage of nearly 8,000,000. The value of the ships lost with cargoes was probably not less than $4,000,000,000. Prior to the war, while her imports vastly exceeded her exports, she was able by reason of her great carrying trade on the ocean and her income from foreign investments to balance her ledger of income and expense. With lessened tonnage in ships, with vastly lessened commerce to carry, and her foreign securities sold to meet the expenses of this war, her situation is necessarily most burdensome.

When the matter of the settlement of our foreign indebtedness was under consideration a year ago, I presented certain tables to show the situation of our principal debtors. As these tables are substantially correct to-day I shall present them again.

The first table which I shall present is one showing the principal and interest owing by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium to the United States. The amounts shown are as of the last interest-paying date prior to the time the table was made.

The table is as follows:

Principal and interest owing by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium to the United States.

Great Britain:
Principal	$4,166,318,358.44
Interest	509,173,742.89
		$4,675,492,101.33
France:
Principal	3,358,104,083.20
Interest	358,410,444.27
		3,716,514,527.47
Italy:
Principal	1,648,034,050.90
Interest	202,279,732.07
		1,850,313,782.97
Belgium:
Principal	377,564,298.77
Interest	42,699,698.78
		420,263,997.55
Total amount due from above four debtor nations:
Principal	9,550,020,791.31
Interest	1,112,563,618.01
		10,662,584,409.32
Total due from all other nations:
Principal	600,380,514.18
Interest	66,316,307.87
		666,696,822.05
Percentage of total indebtedness owing to the United States by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium		94.1
Percentage of total indebtedness owing by all other nations		5.9

I desire to follow this with another table showing the foreign obligations in addition to the obligations from loans made for the purpose of carrying on the war, as follows:

FOREIGN OBLIGATIONS.

The Treasury holds $10,150,401,305.49 of obligations of foreign Governments, distributed as follows:

Obligations of foreign Governments.

Held for advances made under the various Liberty bond acts	$9,434,774,829.24
Received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of sales of surplus war materials (act of July 9, 1918)	574,673,710.21
Received from the American Relief Administration (act of Feb. 25, 1919)	84,093,963.55
Held by the United States Grain Corporation (act of Mar. 30, 1920)	56,858,802.49
Total	10,150,401,305.49

The interest accrued and unpaid up to and including the last interest period upon the obligations of foreign Governments and so-called governments held by the United States amounts to $1,178,879,925.88, and the amount of interest heretofore paid on such obligations is $478,863,632.99.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would explain a little more clearly just what the second table is.

Mr. McCUMBER. The second table covers those amounts received from the American Relief Administration and from the Grain Corporation.

As shown in the first table, the principal credit we gave to Great Britain for which she purchased goods in this country was $4,166,318,358.44. It might be well to indicate what Great Britain was doing for her allies while we were giving her this credit, and I therefore insert a table showing loans made by Great Britain up to March 31, 1921, only suggesting that while some of the payments were not made until after the war, they were for obligations that were included during the war. The table is as follows:

Loans to allies and Dominions by Great Britain, March 31, 1921.

[Converted at 4.86.]

Dominions:
Australia	$437,400,000
New Zealand	143,856,000
Canada	67,068,000
South Africa	36,450,000
Other Dominions and colonies	15,066,000
		$699,840,000
Allies:
Russia	2,728,404,000
France	2,707,020,000
Italy	2,317,248,000
Belgium—
(a) War	458,784,000
(b) Reconstruction	43,740,000
Serbia	107,406,000
Portugal, Rumania, Greece, and other allies	321,732,000
Relief	81,162,000
		8,765,496,000
Total		9,465,336,000

No information as to the rate of interest charged on the above loans.

It will thus be seen that while we were lending to Great Britain $4,166,000,000, Great Britain was lending to her allies $9,465,000,000, or practically two and one-fourth times more than we loaned her. And it ought to be borne in mind right here that while Great Britain has come forward and offered to give her bonds and cash for the $4,675,000,000 and interest which has accrued since the table was made, whereby her entire indebtedness will be made to us as good as gold, she does not expect to receive any material amount from the more than $10,000,000,000 now due her from her allies. She has, so far as I am informed, not received a single cent of interest, and I notice by the press reports that proposals are now made to remit the whole indebtedness.

It might be well also, Mr. President, to include in this statement a table showing the loans to foreign Governments by France. This includes all loans made up to June 30, 1921. I insert the table and simply call attention to the fact that the total amount is $2,717,888,500. The table is as follows:

Loans to foreign Governments by France as of June 30, 1921.

[Converted at 5.18.]

Belgium	$584,300,000
Czechoslovakia	106,000,000
Esthonia	2,222,000
Georgia	38,500
Greece	177,200,000
Italy	9,450,000
Latvia	2,220,000
Lithuania	1,158,000
Montenegro	2,500,000
Poland	208,800,000
Rumania	213,000,000
Russia	1,111,000,000
Serbia	300,000,000
Total	2,717,888,500

No interest rate has been agreed upon and no interest is being paid.

I think we need but one more table to show the status of our principal debtors as compared with our own and which may well appeal to our sense of justice and fairness. I insert a table showing the national debt, the population, and the per capita indebtedness of the United Kingdom, France, United States, and Italy, as follows:

National debts, population, and per capita indebtedness of the United Kingdom, France, United States, and Italy.

National debts (converted at normal pre-war value of the respective currencies):
United Kingdom	$37,910,000,000
France	51,000,000,000
United States	23,922,000,000
Italy	18,650,000,000
Population:
United Kingdom	46,089,000
France	41,476,000
United States	105,683,000
Italy	36,740,000
Per capita indebtedness:
United Kingdom
France	$1,229.62
United States
Italy	507.62

I wish simply to call attention to the fact that with only one-third of the population of the United States, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland has an indebtedness of approximately $38,000,000,000, while that of the United States, with three times the population of the United Kingdom, is something less than $23,000,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask the Senator whether the $38,000,000,000 included the indebtedness of the British colonies as well?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. It, however, includes the money loaned by her to the British colonies.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The per capita indebtedness, as figured upon the population of the British Isles, takes no account of all the other vast population of the British Empire?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true, because the indebtedness which I have mentioned is an indebtedness of the British Government; that is, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland are the principals. They have no authority to levy a tax upon Canada, Australia, New South Wales, or any of the other Dominions.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not quite sure that I understand the Senator's position. Canada, for instance, has a certain bonded indebtedness growing out of the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Canada has a still further indebtedness than this. I am not mentioning that. The British indebtedness does not include the indebtedness that Canada owes. It simply includes the loans that were made by Great Britain to Canada, Australia, and so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. And neither does it include, I dare say, the indebtedness of New Zealand or Australia.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not.

Mr. POMERENE. Or any of the colonies?

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not include the indebtedness of any of the colonies. Their indebtedness is in addition to that of the United Kingdom.

While this table shows the per capita indebtedness of the United Kingdom as $822.54, I am informed that it is to-day more than a thousand dollars per capita, while that of the United States is but $226.35 per capita. And what I have said with reference to Great Britain applies with still greater force to France, where the per capita indebtedness is even much larger.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that when we take all of these things into consideration we must admit that the commission has exacted everything that it could in conscience have asked of the other country. I am not unaware of the criticism that is made that the bonds representing the credits which I have mentioned should bear the same rate of interest and become due at the same time as our Liberty bonds. The first answer to this is that the condition of each particular creditor nation is such that it is impossible to fulfill that understanding. We must remember, however, that up to the present time we have computed interest on the whole sum due from Great Britain at 4½ per cent, which is greater than the rate of interest of the first Liberty bonds, greater than one of the other issues, and somewhat less than two of the issues; so that up to the present time the charges are about the same as our Liberty-bond interest.

Beginning then with December 15, 1922, we are charging a lower rate of interest than that carried by some of our Liberty bonds. The rate is 3½ per cent, or three-fourths of 1 per cent lower than the 4½ per cent carried by our Liberty bonds.

But let us not forget that in the year 1927, four years from now, we can, and in all probability will, retire all of our second Liberty loan bonds, amounting to $3,268,430,450, issuing in lieu thereof bonds bearing 3 per cent, or a half of 1 per cent lower than the long-time British bonds.

Again, in 1928 we have the privilege of paying the third Liberty loan bonds of $3,439,837,750. I believe we shall be able to substitute for these bonds new ones bearing a 3 per cent interest rate. The sum of these two loans, which can be replaced in a very few years by bonds bearing a 3 per cent rate of interest, is greater than the entire British indebtedness, which will, after 10 years, carry a half per cent higher rate of interest than our own bonds.

Again, the fourth Liberty loan bonds, amounting to $6,329,957,850, can all be paid off in 1933 by the issuance of new bonds bearing a like rate of 3 per cent interest.

Thus, Mr. President, in reality will vanish the claim that we shall lose vast sums due to the fact that our Liberty loans at present carry a rate of 4½ per cent interest.

In my judgment, 10 years from now all of our bonds will be carrying a less rate of interest by one-half per cent than those British bonds which will for 52 years longer be carrying a rate of 3½ per cent.

So the claim that in the 62 years, at the rate of interest we are charging our debtors, our people will lose a billion dollars or more is based upon the entirely unwarranted assumption that our indebtedness will all continue to bear the war rate of interest and bear it for 62 years. We all know that that will never happen. We are certain that our Liberty loans, bearing a higher rate than 3 or 3½ per cent, will be taken up and new bonds issued therefor the moment our right to pay them accrues.

Mr. President, much has been said during the past four years as to the great wealth acquired by some of these debtor nations in accepting mandates over what were once the colonial possessions of the vanquished nations, but I find nothing either in the treaty of Versailles or in any subsequent act providing for the annexation of any of the former German or Turkish possessions to any other country. Much of the territory wrested from the enemy is as worthless as the desert of Sahara, but whatever its intrinsic value, it is held by the different countries under mandates which bind the mandatory power to assure equality of right to every other country in the world; and, so far at least, the mandates have imposed heavy expenses upon the mandatory powers in policing and otherwise protecting the mandated territory, and all of those territories are to-day, I think, a liability rather than an asset.

So, also, I know of no authority of any nation to transfer title to a single foot of these old colonial possessions of the enemy.

Mr. President, so far as we are concerned, we have now on our hands about all the color-line problems that we care to assume. What we want is cash, the payment of our claims and the interest thereon; and this bill assures the payment of the major part of that indebtedness and all that is owing by the principal country, with good interest—very good interest as measured by the usual interest charges on bonds of great countries in times of peace.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was one of the members of the commission which made this debt settlement. I have no doubt that there are many questions which will be asked concerning what took place in the sessions of the commission and the reasons which guided the commission in agreeing to the terms which I have presented. I therefore ask that the Senator from Utah kindly take charge of the bill for the reasons which I have given.

During the delivery of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant marine act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the request will be granted, and that after I have completed my remarks we can take up the question as to whether the laying aside temporarily shall or shall not become permanent for the day.

Mr. KING. Of course, a request from the distinguished Senator from North Dakota under ordinary circumstances is a command, so far as I am concerned, but, much as I should be glad to accede to his request at this time, I feel constrained to object to the request submitted by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14254, the British debt funding bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment before that motion is put.

Mr. KING. I am very glad the Senator from Washington has made the motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who has just returned to the Senate, desires to have the matter go over to-day, and I hope the Senator from Washington and the junior Senator from Utah, in accordance with that wish, will allow me to complete my remarks and then let the bill go over at least for the day.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend from North Dakota that if the motion submitted by the Senator from Washington, which is one that I was going to make myself, shall prevail, then the debt bill, which is so important that the President felt that he should come before the Congress and recommend its immediate consideration, will be before the Senate. The Senator then may proceed with his remarks and may take all the rest of the afternoon, and I am sure we shall be delighted to hear him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me say in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that I think I have been rather decent in connection with the handling of the shipping bill. I recognize the importance of the debt bill, and I am not disposed to hinder or delay its passage. Under the unanimous-consent request which I submitted I was perfectly willing to go on to-day and to-morrow with the debt bill and possibly dispose of it.

I do not know what advantage the Senator from Utah seems to think he might get by moving to take up the debt funding bill. Of course, if we have the votes to take up the shipping bill when the debt bill is disposed of, we can take it up by motion, but it has not been the usual practice to do that. It has been the almost uniform custom in the Senate, as a matter of courtesy, if the Senator in charge of the bill asks to temporarily lay it aside, that it is laid aside for the consideration of other matters. I had hoped the Senator from Utah would permit that to be done in this case, but if he does not desire to do it, I am perfectly willing to have the motion to proceed to the consideration of the debt bill acted upon by the Senate and take up that bill and dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the junior Senator from Utah to object to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Washington and that the Senator from Washington has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14254.

Mr. KING. I accede to that motion, and I hope the Senator will vote affirmatively to displace the ship subsidy bill and proceed to the consideration of this very important measure, which the President of the United States regarded as so important that he felt it necessary to come and address the Congress in respect to the same. So I am ready for a vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to express the hope now that the Senate will proceed to consider the debt bill until it is finally disposed of.

After the conclusion of Mr. McCUMBER's speech,

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the pending bill which I send to the desk, and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, and it will be printed and lie on the table.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3 it is proposed to insert the following new sections:

SEC. 2. That the first section of the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, is amended to read as follows:

"That a World War Foreign Debt Commission is hereby created consisting of eight members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and seven of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than four members so appointed shall be from the same political party."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of section 2 of this act shall not affect the tenure of office of any person who is a member of the World War Foreign Debt Commission at the time this act takes effect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question, if I may.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall be glad to answer any question.

Mr. POMERENE. In the presentation of this subject to the Senate the chairman of the Committee on Finance has referred to the fact that the rate of interest to be paid on bonds which are to be given to us by Great Britain is less than the rate of interest which we are now paying on our bonds. The Senator also called attention to the fact that several of our issues of bonds mature at a comparatively early date, which, of course, would enable our Government to refund those bonds if we are not prepared to pay them. The question I had in mind was this: Did not the Senator from North Dakota understand that when the dates of maturity of these several issues of bonds were fixed it was the belief then not only of the executive branch of the Government but of the Congress of the United States that after the World War had been concluded and world conditions became normal we could certainly refund those bonds at a very much less rate of interest than we were paying on the short-time bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that was expected, and I think a fair construction of the law would be that if we refunded those bonds at a less rate of interest, as well as if we were compelled to refund at a greater rate, the debtor nations should have the advantage in the one instance and in the other should be bound by whatever interest we had to pay.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I merely wished to bring that out a little more fully, because I was perfectly clear that that would be the answer which the Senator from North Dakota would make.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me, I desire to say that in the Committee on Finance the other day the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] desired to secure what might be denominated the minutes of the meetings of the Debt Commission. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] informed him that practically no minutes were kept; that whatever memoranda were kept were simply kept by Assistant Secretary Wadsworth, who was acting as secretary of the commission, and that none of them gave any information as to the discussions of the commission. I informed the Senator from Wisconsin, however, that I would ask Mr. Wadsworth to send up any statements or any records that he kept, and, if he kept any that he thought it was not improper to give to the public, we would have them printed.

The testimony has already been printed, and I should like to have read into the RECORD the letter which I hold in my hand from Mr. Wadsworth in answer to a telephonic communication which I had with him.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator desire to have the letter printed in the RECORD or read at the desk?

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked that it might be read into the RECORD, for I thought possibly Senators would like to hear it.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to have it read, and I therefore join in the request of the Senator from North Dakota that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT COMMISSION,
Washington, February 10, 1923.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your request by telephone, I beg to give you the following information as to the records which were kept by the World War Foreign Debt Commission covering conferences with the representatives of the British Government in regard to the funding of the debt of that Government to the United States.

At the first meeting, which took place on January 8, 1923, it developed that the British representatives were unable to consider terms within the authority of the commission under the act of February 9, 1922, so it was concluded upon the part of the commission that it should proceed by informal discussion in order, if possible, to arrive at an arrangement upon terms which the commission might feel justified in recommending to the President for presentation to Congress for its consideration.

Upon discussion, it proved agreeable to both sides that the conferences should be considered as strictly informal and that nothing which might be said upon either side should be considered as a commitment; that no stenographer should be present or record kept of the proceedings. A number of conferences were held, each lasting for a considerable period, during which a most complete and exhaustive discussion took place of the many questions, economic and financial, which surrounded this problem. Aside from a formal record as to the dates and hours of the meetings and of those present, no further record was kept.

The terms which the commission finally determined to present to the British representatives as the limit which it would feel justified in recommending to the President were arrived at in the course of these conferences. These terms were not reduced to writing until after the British representatives had returned to England and had advised the British ambassador by cable that he was authorized to state that the British Government would accept the suggested terms in principle. Thereupon, in conference with the British ambassador, the terms were reduced to writing in the form of a statement to which the commission and the British ambassador agreed, which statement was given out to the public in the form shown on the attached sheet.

I trust that this fully explains the situation.

Yours very truly,

ELIOT WADSWORTH,
Secretary of the Commission.

Hon. PORTER J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

(Inclosure.)

FEBRUARY 2, 1923.

The Funding Commission met this afternoon to consider the final details of the proposed plan for funding the debt of Great Britain to the United States. Ambassador Geddes was present.

The commission decided to make the following recommendation to the President as a basis for settlement, which it is understood will be accepted by the British Government:

Summary.

Principal of notes to be refunded	$4,074,818,358.44
Interest accrued and unpaid up to December 15, 1922, at the rate of 4¼ per cent	629,836,106.99
	4,704,654,465.43
Deduct payments made October 16, 1922, and November 15, 1922, with interest at 4¼ per cent thereon to December 15, 1922	100,526,379.69
	4,604,128,085.74
To be paid in cash	4,128,085.74
Total principal of indebtedness as of December 15, 1922, for which British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government at par	4,600,000,000.00

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

The British Government shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of the principal of the bonds on any interest date upon 90 days' previous notice.

Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates on December 15 and June 15 of each year:

Three per cent semiannually, June 15, 1923, to December 15, 1932, inclusive.

Three and one-half per cent semiannually, June 15, 1933, until final payment.

For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. There are comparatively few Senators in the Chamber now. The Senator who is about to address the Senate is a member of the commission which negotiated this settlement. I think Senators ought at least to have the opportunity of attending and hearing what he has to say. Unless he objects to my doing so, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Glass	McNary	Smith
Bayard	Gooding	Moses	Smoot
Borah	Harreld	Nelson	Spencer
Brookhart	Harris	New	Stanfield
Calder	Heflin	Norbeck	Sterling
Cameron	Hitchcock	Norris	Sutherland
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Couzens	Kellogg	Owen	Trammell
Culberson	Keyes	Page	Underwood
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dial	Ladd	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Lodge	Reed, Mo.	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	McCormick	Robinson	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sheppard	Watson
George	McKellar	Shields	Willis
Gerry	McKinley	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish every Senator had listened to the clear and understandable statement of the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] affecting the refunding of the British debt to the Government of the United States. In fact, I had planned to follow the same lines followed by the Senator from North Dakota, but I feel that it would be unwise for me at this time virtually to repeat what he has so well said.

No doubt in the discussion many questions will be asked. It would have expedited matters very greatly if all Senators could have been present when the outlines of the settlement were so well presented. There are, however, a few points that I feel ought to be called to the attention of the Senate that were not covered by the splendid speech of the Senator from North Dakota.

All Senators understand that for two years, at least, there has been a propaganda throughout the country the object of which was to impress upon the American people, if possible, the thought that it would be for the best interests not only of America but of the world as a whole to cancel all of the debts owed by foreign countries to the United States.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President did not the Senator entertain that view himself? Did he not express some such opinion as that here on the floor?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not, but to the contrary; and the Senator knows it, because when he called attention to the matter upon this floor once before I took the RECORD and asked the Senator to read the RECORD, and he was kind enough to make the correction upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; there were apparently conflicting statements; but, of course, when the Senator says that he did not entertain that view, that ends it with me.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only has the Senator from Utah been opposed to it from the very first moment it was suggested in the United States, but I want to say that every member of the commission has been opposed to it, and the thought never entered the mind of any member of the commission that it would be the proper thing to cancel the debts of the foreign countries to America. So, whatever propaganda there has been in the past—and it is still on, to a limited degree—it has had no effect whatever in the rates of interest and the terms of settlement of which the commission is now asking Congress to approve.

Shortly after the creation of the commission, and in fact, I may say, at its very first meeting, the commission gave notice to all debtor countries that we were ready to meet with them and negotiate upon the question of refunding their indebtedness to the United States. The representatives of the foreign governments knew what powers had been conferred upon the commission to make a settlement of their obligations. They knew that the powers that were granted the commission were limited. They knew that the minimum rate of interest was 4½ per cent. They knew that it was provided that the life of the obligation should not exceed 25 years, and they knew also that the other power granted to the commission was that whatever interest might have accumulated upon the debt up until the time a settlement was arrived at could be added by the commission to the principal.

Those were the only powers granted to the commission, and they had to undertake to arrive, if possible, at a settlement upon those terms. Your commission knew it was impossible to do so, and I might add that the Finance Committee of the Senate, when they reported the bill to the Senate, knew that it was impossible to make a settlement upon those terms, and I think upon two occasions the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] gave in the Senate the reason why the terms were as they were, because he knew that whatever modifications of those terms were made must be submitted to the Congress before the commission could agree to a settlement of the claims of the foreign countries. I want to say that, in my humble opinion, knowing the condition of the other countries, outside of Great Britain, which owe this Nation vast sums of money, your commission can not reach a settlement with those countries on the terms they have recommended to the President and which the President has recommended to the Congress to be approved. So I do not look for any settlement with any foreign country to be made by your commission without submitting the terms to Congress and receiving approval from Congress of the terms which may be submitted at that time.

Following the invitations extended to all the countries owing the United States there appeared before your commission diplomatic representatives authorized by their governments to appear in behalf of their government in relation to the indebtedness owing to the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The pending bill would amend the existing law so as to authorize settlements with the other countries upon substantially the same terms as the settlement with Great Britain. If that should be enacted and become a law, the commission would be authorized to make settlement upon those terms without bringing them back to Congress. So I interpret the statement now made by the Senator, to the effect that all these will come back to Congress, to mean that it will be necessary to offer terms to the other nations more favorable than those accorded to Great Britain in its settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. Under conditions in the world to-day, I will say to the Senator that that is my humble opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that part of the pending bill becomes rather immaterial, then, because, even with that, the matter will have to come back to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and I want to say to the Senator that the words referred to by him just now were agreed upon by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. They were not in the original bill as offered by myself in the Senate and by Representative BURTON in the House.

Not only did the diplomatic representatives of some of the countries appear before the commission, but a number of the countries sent delegations to Washington to meet with the commission, ostensibly for the purpose of seeing if an agreement of settlement could be arrived at on better terms than provided for in the act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says a number of the countries sent delegations to Washington to see if terms could be agreed upon. Has France ever conferred with the commission and submitted any plan?

Mr. SMOOT. France sent a delegation headed by Mr. Parmentier.

Mr. BORAH. Did they submit any proposition?

Mr. SMOOT. They submitted no proposition, nor could we submit any proposition, because of the fact that they had no authority to talk settlement or terms of settlement.

Mr. BORAH. What was Mr. Parmentier's business over here?

Mr. SMOOT. I think he came because of the invitation issued by the commission. I will say to the Senator, however, that there was nothing whatever accomplished.

Mr. BORAH. And no proposition submitted?

Mr. SMOOT. France did not submit a proposition of settlement.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I want to call the Senator's attention to lines 16 and 17 on page 3 of the bill—and settlements, similar but not more favorable in terms, with other Governments indebted to the United States.

Was there any understanding between the commissioners that if the United States would settle upon more favorable terms with other Governments, Great Britain should have the benefit?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever; and there was no understanding between our commission and the British commission that those words should be used in any law or in any bill which may be presented to Congress. As I stated before to the Senator from Montana, the words "but not more favorable" were agreed to by the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

No adjustment could be made within the law, or one which the commission could recommend to Congress, except in the case of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The terms of the settlement are incorporated in the pending bill. They have been approved by the President, and it has been earnestly recommended by him that they be adopted by Congress, and as a member of the commission I can not too strongly urge at this time that the terms be approved by Congress. I think they are the very best terms the Government of the United States ought to have asked of England, taking into consideration the conditions existing in the world to-day; taking into consideration the effect the imposition of more drastic terms would have upon the exchange values between the two countries; taking into consideration the fact that it would be an immense advantage to the Government of the United States in her commerce not only with England but with the world if the pound sterling were at par the same as the dollar of America. I think I ought to say at this point that if the pound sterling were at par there would be a much better chance for the exportation of all kinds of foodstuffs from this country to England; and, I might add, not only foodstuffs but everything we export to that country or any of her dependencies.

Under the last administration the payment of interest was suspended upon all the foreign countries' obligations. Secretary of the Treasury CARTER GLASS, now an honored Member of this body, on the 18th day of December, 1919, sent a letter to the Committee on Ways and Means in which he said:

> The collection in dollars of this interest under present circumstances would be no less disastrous to American interests than to the interests of the debtors.

I think that statement, made at that time, was absolutely true, and for the reason that the Secretary announced that principle, I say now that your commission thought that under conditions existing to-day it was no more than fair to Great Britain to say that for the first 10 years of the life of the bonds the interest shall be 3 per cent, and for the balance of the time that the bonds run 3½ per cent.

Further, Mr. President, they were given the privilege of paying the interest in the first five years one-half in cash and one-half in bonds of the British Government similar in form to the bonds which will be given for the original debt, as shown under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has just been discussing the reasons for the low rate of interest to be paid by the British Government for the 10-year period beginning December 15, 1922, and expiring December 15, 1932. I have not fully comprehended the justification made by the Senator from Utah for that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not through yet.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that it is generally believed that interest rates are higher now than they will be in the future, certainly higher than they are expected to be unless world events take an unfortunate course after December 15, 1932. Why, then, I ask the Senator from Utah, was a lower interest rate made effective for the period when the prevailing interest rates throughout the world are higher than for the period following December 15, 1932, when it would seem that world conditions may have been adjusted to a degree that would justify the hope, at least, that interest rates may be reduced? In other words, why is the interest rate fixed at 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent for the subsequent period of the loan, when it is universally believed that the interest rate is higher now than it will be after the expiration of the first 10-year period?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want briefly to state that there are a number of reasons why, but in the examination of the budget of Great Britain for the year 1923 we find that there is an item of £110,000,000 to be paid to the unemployed in Great Britain.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baldwin, thought that the amount could not be decreased for some years to come. He was in hopes, however, that the economic conditions of the world, at least within five years, would be such that there will not be the unemployment in Great Britain that exists to-day and has existed for some years past. He was in hopes that out of the amount required now for the payment of the unemployed in Great Britain they will be able to pay us a higher rate of interest following the 10-year period.

But in this connection I wish to say that Great Britain has the privilege of paying the bonds at any time, and if history is to repeat itself and the rates of interest shall average as they have in the world from 1797, Great Britain will be able to borrow money at a very much less rate long, long years before the bonds become due. I call attention to the fact that, taking the equivalent yield upon the obligations of Great Britain for 50 years before the war, the average yield was 2.95 per cent per annum. Taking the years beginning 1888, when the average yield was 2.9, year by year succeeding it was as follows: 2.8, 2.8, 2.9, 2.8, 2.7, 2.6, 2.5, 2.4. The last figure given was in the year 1897, and I have not any more doubt than that I stand here at this moment that the rates of interest will not be very much higher than they have been in the past if economic conditions in the world ever return to what they were before the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's reply to the Senator from Arkansas a moment ago presents what is to me the most interesting feature of the entire controversy. The supposition seems to be upon the part of those gentlemen who visited us, the members of the British Commission, that conditions are going to be better and the economic situation more encouraging within a short time. Now if the present policies of Europe continue to obtain, Great Britain will be less able to take care of the situation 10 years from now, or 25 years from now than she is now.

That presents, if I should vote against the bill, the only reason why I do so, not because of the rate of interest in the mere settlement of the collection of the debt, but because there accompanies the settlement nothing in the way of an indication upon the part of any of the European powers of a change of policies which must inevitably result before there can be any better economic conditions in Europe.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator must admit that with the two great English speaking peoples of the earth agreeing upon a settlement of the debt between the two and upon a fair and just rate of interest, it is going to have a wonderful effect upon the economic situation in the world. I will state to the Senator that if Europe continues to spend money in the way she is doing to-day, and if France particularly, does not cut her budget from what it is for the year 1923, France will not be able to pay her obligations to the United States, nor her obligations to her own people.

Mr. BORAH. I hesitate to express any views contrary to the views of the Senator from Utah in a matter of this kind, but I venture to say that unless there is a complete change of program and policy obtaining on the Continent of Europe the debt settlement effect upon economic and financial conditions will be very temporary, and unless those changes are to be permanent the situation is going to be no better in 10 or 25 years from now than it is at the present time.

I had always hoped that the settlement of the debt proposition would be one of the elements of an undertaking to adjust those conditions so that we might have a different condition of affairs confronting us on the Continent of Europe. The mere fact that two English-speaking races are cooperating or acting together, if the policies remain as destructive as they are at present, will assist the situation very little. It is that phase of the settlement that interests me, not the question of whether or not the rate shall be 3 per cent or 3½ per cent, but whether or not we are utilizing this instrumentality of debt for the purpose of effectuating or seeking to effectuate policies which will be of some benefit economically not only to Europe but to our own country.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho must admit that even with the debt settlement which we are now asking Congress to approve, we are in a very much stronger position to use our influence with European countries as to their future expenditures of money than we are in holding the I O U's which we are now holding.

Mr. BORAH. Now, if that is true, it is the most conclusive argument that can be presented to me for the settlement of the debt. If it is true that after we have settled the debt, and the terms of it have been agreed upon, and the matter has passed out of our hands—because it is then a mere question of their owing us so much, at stated periods to be paid, and so forth—if it is true that that will enable us to be more influential and more potential in adjusting the economic conditions of the world, that is a most conclusive argument to me why we should approve of it.

But I do not see much hope in that way. If a man had a large farm and owed me $10,000, and it was due, and he should come to me for an extension of time for 10 years, I would be very much concerned before I made that grant to know whether or not he was going to change his program so that he could run his farm under better conditions in the future than he had in the past. If he was going to continue to live beyond his means, to absolutely destroy his means of production, and to devote his energy, money, and everything else to that which would not produce but would destroy, I would be interested in taking possession as soon as I could. Now, we can not take possession, and we do not want to do so; but I have always thought, and I still think, that with the adjustment of these debts ought to be an effort to adjust the economic problems, without the adjustment of which the settlement of the debt will not mean a great deal. I would treat them as a single element in the whole economic situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say, in answer to the Senator, that if Great Britain becomes a bankrupt, at any time in our lives at least, I say God have pity upon the other peoples of the world.

Mr. BORAH. If a nation is in a position where it can not pay its debts and says that it can not pay its debts according to its agreements, as announced, what is the difference between that nation and a bankrupt nation? All these nations are threatened with bankruptcy, and if the present policies of war and turmoil and huge military establishments continue they will be bankrupt.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt that England will conform to and pay her obligations if the settlement is agreed upon.

Mr. BORAH. That may be true.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the least doubt of it, but I want to say to the Senator in passing that I can not say the same so far as some of the other countries are concerned.

Mr. BORAH. No; and the disposition does not seem to be there.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is true, too.

Mr. BORAH. But what I say is that England may be able to meet this obligation, but she has given us to understand that as it existed, with the obligation as it was, she was unable to meet it. Now, the fact of the business is that those nations are either bankrupt or upon the verge of bankruptcy.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, assuming the situation to be as the Senator from Idaho suggests, is not this the first necessary step to take, namely, to settle the obligation of Great Britain, and then we can take care of world conditions thereafter by an economic conference and the association of nations which is to be formed?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I do not want to get into the question of an economic conference.

Mr. BORAH. No; and I do not want to get into the subject of an economic conference either. I want to say that we may treat it lightly or we may treat it seriously, but this thing of juggling with debts until the securities of the debts are arranged and new policies are adopted upon which the security may be based with some degree of certainty will not bring the satisfaction now anticipated. If they are going to continue to build a vast military establishment and expend their money for destructive purposes, the mere question of arranging the debt will have but little effect upon the people of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. It is my opinion that if the settlement is accomplished and becomes a fact, it will have more effect upon the economic condition of the world than all the economic conferences that could be held. I want to say frankly to the Senator from Idaho that I can not see what is going to come out of an economic conference, to be held here or in any foreign country, taking all the countries into account, because I believe that the very first demand that would be made of the United States in such a conference would be to cancel all the debts of foreign countries owing to the United States. The next demand, I think, that would be made at that conference would be that France should be guaranteed against invasion from Germany. I think those questions would be the first that would be presented and would be the very first demands to be made; and are we prepared to grant them? I think not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me suggest to the Senator that the first thing which would be demanded would be money.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, suppose the first thing demanded were money; suppose the second thing demanded were a guaranty, and the third thing demanded were a cancellation, what would our representatives be doing in that conference? Would we accede to the demands without hesitation? At a conference are different demands made from those which are made when commissions meet? Would the demand have any more sanction behind it than that in any other conference? I assume that the conference would be gathered together for the purpose of presenting the different views of the various nations, and if they presented their views as to the necessity of cancellation we might well say "In consideration of the cancellation, what do you propose to give in return in the way of adjusting your policy?" So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing to cancel every dollar of this indebtedness if the economic conditions of Europe could be so adjusted that the producers of this country could have the benefit of the European markets for the next 20 years. If they do not have that benefit, the mere fact of the adjustment of this debt will be of very little benefit to the farmers of this country who in the meantime are being sold out for taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think it would be profitable at this point to go any further into the question of an economic conference.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. In this morning's newspapers appears the statement that with the adjustment of the British debt other countries, especially France, will be permitted to go on and make no adjustment of their debt. Is there anything in that statement?

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing whatever in that statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. The country may understand, then, that France and the other countries which owe us are to be pressed for a settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. Your commission is going to do everything in its power to try to arrive at a settlement with all of the countries which are indebted to the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. Immediately?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as quickly as it is possible to be done.

Mr. CARAWAY. But there is to be no let up in the effort to do it now?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

I will say to the Senator that we have answers from nearly all of the countries that are indebted to us, but some of those answers are not satisfactory. Your commission is going to try, if possible, to secure some kind of a proposition from those countries, and when their propositions shall have been submitted your commission will follow the same course as it has in the case of Great Britain and ask for authority to make the settlement. There are a number of countries, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, that I wish we could receive the full amount of the indebtedness which they owe us without any interest from them in 10 or 20 years if such a settlement could be secured.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say, Mr. President, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has asked about the other countries, that the Prime Minister of France has notified us when France is going to pay her debt. He has stated that she would pay it when she has collected from Germany.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that the Prime Minister of France has not notified the Debt Commission to that effect, and even that is a better promise than we have received.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the commission could not have received a much worse proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to state, in answer to the question which the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] asked me, that the debt per capita in Great Britain to-day is $800, and the taxes which are imposed upon the British people amount to-day for every man, woman, and child to a little over $100 a year.

I also call attention to the fact that the cost of the British Government between the years 1914 and 1920 was more than it was for the 226 years preceding the year 1914, and in those figures the cost of all her former wars is taken into consideration. So during a period of six years the people of Great Britain incurred a debt and raised tremendous sums by taxation, the aggregate of which was more than the cost of the British Government for 226 years. Great Britain owes approximately $38,000,000,000, and yet I feel just as confident as that I live that if this settlement is made with Great Britain she will live up to the terms of the settlement; and if, perchance, conditions shall be such as to compel her to extend the payment of the debt over a period of 62 years, she will have paid us at the end of that time nearly $11,200,000,000. I thought I had the exact figures before me, but I can not at this instant find them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much will the American Government have paid out on account of this $4,600,000,000 indebtedness in a like period?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Tennessee refer to the interest upon the indebtedness?

Mr. McKELLAR. I refer to both interest and principal. The Senator is figuring the interest and principal on what the British Government is going to pay, and I ask the Senator what amount he has figured, or has he figured it at all, the American Government is going to pay on the same debt during the same time?

Mr. SMOOT. No one would be able to give those figures, because the amount would depend upon how much of the indebtedness we collected and applied to the redemption of our interest-bearing obligations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Our bonds already bear interest and have already been issued, so it would be very easy to calculate as to how much we should pay in that period.

Mr. SMOOT. If we should take every dollar to be paid us by Great Britain and lock it up in a vault and should not redeem any of our bonds, then the argument of the Senator from Tennessee would have some effect; but who would be so silly as to do a thing of that kind?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I did not ask any such question as that. The Senator from Utah knows that the aggregate amount of principal and interest payments by Great Britain during the next 62 years will be, on an average, according to his own figures or the commission's own figures, $15,000,000 less than the interest which the United States is now paying each year. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we were going to keep our obligations at just the same rate of interest that we are paying on them to-day for 62 years, of course, the Senator's statement would be correct; but we have the right to pay off many of our Liberty loan bonds in 1927, and, no doubt, they will be refunded at that time and at a lower rate of interest.

I wish also to say to the Senator that if those bonds were refunded to-day by tax-exempt bonds, I have no doubt the new issue could be floated at 3 per cent. We talk about a rate of interest of 4¼ per cent on our bonds, but Senators must remember that those bonds are taxable; they must remember that a certain amount of the interest upon those bonds is collected back by the United States in the shape of taxes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he is in favor of the American Government issuing tax-free bonds in lieu of the bonds which are now outstanding to which he has referred?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows my position in relation to tax-exempt securities. If I had my way I would never allow the Government of the United States to issue another tax-exempt bond or obligation of any kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course. Then, why is the Senator endeavoring to figure on the basis of tax-exempt securities when he is opposed to the issuance of such securities?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not look for any early prohibition of the powers of the States or the powers of the Government to issue tax-free securities. I know such a prohibition may not now be brought about, although I know the issuance of such securities is drying up the sources of income of our Government, and that it has a tendency to make districts and counties, States, and the Nation itself extravagant in the expenditure of money. I believe that in the future at some time or other the American people will wake up and realize that tax-exempt bonds for school districts, for counties, for road purposes, for State governmental purposes, and for national purposes have reached such an immense amount that all of the rich men of this country, through their purchase, may escape the payment of every cent of taxes not only to the National Government but to the State governments, to the county governments, and to the cities; and not only that, but when they die they will know that every dollar so invested will go without the payment of any inheritance tax. I believe that some day the people will wake up to a realization of what the issuance of tremendous volumes of tax-exempt securities means to them and their Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Utah realizes that the principal basis for opposition to the bill now under consideration grows out of, first, the interest rate, and, second, the time for payment; and I think it may be stated with reasonable accuracy that at this time the basis for the opposition centers mainly about the interest rate. The Senator has stated that it is expected that the economic conditions of the world, and particularly of Europe, will become so readjusted within the next 10 years that interest rates will decline. I asked him the question purely for information and not in a controversial spirit, why, then, is the interest rate in the settlement made lower for the first 10 years than it is for the remainder of the period for which a portion of the debt may run? If I understand the Senator from Utah correctly, he states that that adjustment and that arrangement were based principally upon consideration of the present ability of the British Government to meet its obligations.

Mr. SMOOT. And to assist in stabilizing conditions in the world to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON. If at the end of the 10-year period the hope of the world shall be realized and conditions shall have become stabilized and interest rates shall have declined so that the prevailing rates on Government securities shall be lower than 3½ per cent, is there in the mind of the commission the reservation that the remainder of the debt then due from the British Government to the United States may be refunded at a lower rate of interest than that contemplated in the pending settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no doubt that, if conditions become normal at the end of 10 years, the rate of interest will be such that England will be able to sell her bonds and pay the Government of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator did not quite comprehend my question. The settlement gives the British Government the benefit of a low rate of interest for the first 10 years, and it fixes a higher rate of interest, somewhat in disregard of the general economic conditions, which would call for a higher rate during the first 10 years than for the remainder of the debt period. That is, it is 3 per cent for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent for the remainder of the period. My question is, If we give Great Britain the benefit of the low rate of interest for the first 10 years, will we likely be asked to give her the benefit of the prevailing rate of interest at the expiration of the 10-year period?

Mr. SMOOT. No such thought ever entered the minds of the commission, and I do not think the British representatives had any such thought in their minds.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is, then, the intention of the commission, so far as the Senator from Utah can express it, that this settlement shall be final, and that, while Great Britain is given an advantage in the rate of interest for the first 10 years, that advantage may be reversed in the remainder of the debt period—52 years—and may reflect itself to the benefit of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it. The bonds will be issued, the terms of the bonds will be specifically stated, and there is only one way in which they can be withdrawn by Great Britain herself, and she will have to take the initiative, and that is by paying the amount of the bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when will they be payable? May she pay them at certain periods? If so, what periods?

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the bonds are concerned, on 90 days' notice she can pay any amount of them that she wants to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. At any time upon 90 days' notice?

Mr. SMOOT. At any time after 90 days following an interest period.

Mr. ROBINSON. So that if, at the end of a 10-year period, conditions permit, she may refund her indebtedness, and, by procuring a loan at a lower rate of interest, pay off the debt to the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. She has that privilege.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seemed to me when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was speaking, and when he put in the RECORD the tabulated statement of payments year by year, that the last column in that table is calculated to give the public an erroneous idea of what amount Great Britain is required to pay to the United States year by year during the next five years. As stated in that list, the United States is to receive in principal and interest the first year $161,000,000, the second year $160,310,000, the third year $160,620,000, the fourth year $160,900,000, and the fifth year $160,150,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, when I mentioned that there would be $23,000,000 paid the first year, I thought I stated that was on the principal; and, of course, in addition she would have to pay the 3 per cent upon the entire indebtedness of $4,000,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish this statement. In the five-year period, therefore, it appears, according to this column, that Great Britain would be under obligation to pay us $803,760,000; but there are two provisions in this bill which give Great Britain a very valuable option, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a valuable option, and it was done for the very purpose of assisting her in tiding over the actual economic conditions existing to-day in Great Britain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The effect of that option, if exercised by Great Britain, would be as follows: She would be able to omit the payment of $23,000,000 in principal the first year and $23,000,000 in principal the second year. She would be able to cut down her interest payment one-half the first year, one-half the second year, one-half the third year, one-half the fourth year, and one-half the fifth year, and have that added to the principal indebtedness.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, by issuing bonds covering the amounts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the net result of that? Instead of paying to the United States $803,760,000 in principal and interest during the first five years the actual payments to us during that period would be $408,660,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the payments in cash.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. Let me finish this. The result of that would be that $395,100,000 would be added to the principal, and that would draw interest at the rate of only 3 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Up to the end of the 10 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that, in effect, those two options amount to allowing Great Britain to add $395,100,000 to the indebtedness which she will owe us, and upon which she will pay us only 3 per cent for the first 10 years.

Mr. SMOOT. No; from the year she exercises the option. The 5-year period is on the principal only.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the 5-year period is on the interest. I have stated it exactly as it figures up.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Instead of paying us, during the first five years, $803,760,000 of principal and interest, she will, in effect, by exercising those options, pay us only $408,660,000, and she will secure from us an additional loan of $395,100,000 at 3 per cent interest.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, for the interest, up to the end of the 10-year period.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; within the 10-year period.

Mr. President, I am thoroughly in favor of making a just and a generous settlement with Great Britain. I think the commission has undoubtedly had that in mind, and has done what it considered wise under the circumstances; but I question very much whether, in conceding 3 per cent interest for the first 10 years, we should go so far as to allow Great Britain to add $395,000,000 to the principal, to bear 3 per cent interest.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say frankly to the Senator—and I do not think Great Britain would object to my saying so here upon the floor of the Senate—that they did accept, in principle, the proposition made to them of 3 per cent straight for 10 years, and 3½ per cent for the remaining 52 years.

That was the cablegram that came from England, that they accepted it in principle; but the question of what "in principle" meant came up when the commission met, and the British ambassador, being instructed by his Government, asked the commission if they could not recommend to the President and whether the President would not recommend to the Congress to relieve them, because of the conditions existing to-day, of one-half of the interest for that limited period by accepting bonds instead of cash, and that was granted.

Great Britain is not pleading poverty altogether, and it is not all one-sided. If we can get the trade of the world balanced so that we will not have to have gold shipped to this country as it has been in the past, piling up here by the billions of dollars, if we can get our exchange so that it will bring the pound sterling to par, I want to say to the Senator that it means much to America, it means much to the commerce of our country, it means much to England; and the commission felt that it was not an unreasonable request, taking into consideration the conditions existing to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that the representatives of Great Britain accepted by cable the proposition to have this loan based upon 3 per cent interest for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent interest for the last 52 years, and that we voluntarily gave them this additional bonus or privilege?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not voluntarily; I did not say that. I said that in their cable they accepted it in principle—that is, that they would pay the full 3 per cent—but they did request that we give them the further privilege of paying one-half of the amount of interest for the first 10 years in bonds similar to the original bonds and cash for the balance; and whenever advantage was taken of the privilege, whatever year it might be, they would pay interest at the rate provided for in the original bonds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, in effect, that amounts to loaning Great Britain $395,000,000 at 3 per cent interest, in addition to what she owes us?

Mr. SMOOT. Of the interest that she owes us; yes—not of the principal that she owes us; of the interest that she owes us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an additional advance to Great Britain of $395,000,000 at 3 per cent within the 10 years over and above what she already had agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to say that she had agreed to it. She agreed to it in principle, and the ambassador of Great Britain asked that his Government be given the further privilege during this period of paying one-half the interest in bonds instead of in cash.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will defer to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wanted to offer this suggestion: It has been said that this was in effect making a new loan. As I understand the proposition, it is simply deferring the payment of that interest. It is not by any means a new loan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have another criticism to make. I am very sure that the average individual, in reading this tabulated statement, would draw the conclusion that the commission had made a deal with Great Britain which obligated Great Britain to pay us in principal and interest during the next five years $803,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But upon reading these two provisions, evidently injected into the bill as a subsequent matter, we find that instead of receiving $803,000,000 we will receive only $408,000,000 and that $395,000,000 will be deferred at 3 per cent interest. I say that even admitting that the Senator was justified in going beyond the original contract which Great Britain had accepted in principle, it ought to be shown here on this tabulated statement, which was put in for the guidance of Senators, that instead of receiving $803,000,000 during the next five years we may, and probably will, receive only $408,000,000. We should at least be candid with ourselves.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and I want to be candid with the Senate. We could not make out a tabulated statement of that kind, because we do not know whether Great Britain will take advantage of that option for half the period, or one-third the period, or what part of it. She is not going to postpone payment any longer than she has to. She wants to stop whatever interest she can, of course; but I believe, as the Senator says, that she will be compelled to take advantage of the option to pay half of the interest during that period.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly, because she will be borrowing $395,000,000 at 3 per cent, whereas in the open market she would be paying about 5 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; not now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know; not on Treasury notes, but upon some of her bonds. I will say she would be paying 5 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. As to her consols, of course the Senator knows how they are sold; and she can sell them at most any time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there ought to be a correction of the tabulated statement, and we ought to state the fact that, instead of making a bargain with Great Britain under which she is to pay us $803,000,000 in five years, it is really a bargain under which she is going to pay us $408,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course the bill itself explains that in detail. This tabulation was made just as I stated it was, because we could not have said what the payments would be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have found no difficulty in figuring out what the payments will be, and I can not have any doubt that those are the payments which Great Britain is going to make, because they are the most favorable to her.

Mr. SMOOT. They may be; if the rates of interest are as high, they may be. I do not know what will happen in 10 years.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, what amount of unemployment compensation does the Senator say Great Britain is paying annually?

Mr. SMOOT. Their budget calls for £110,000,000 for the year 1923.

Mr. DIAL. Are there any prospects of that decreasing?

Mr. SMOOT. We hope it will decrease. If not England could not pay her budget without a deficit. I think there will be a decrease, and so does the representative of England.

Mr. BORAH. I take it that England does not think so just now, in view of the condition of affairs. I do not know what Mr. Baldwin thinks, but I know that is not the view of the semiofficial English press. Under present conditions it is expected it will increase, and a most serious situation is anticipated during the coming summer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I find it difficult to conceive why we should make any concession to Great Britain with respect to this loan because she pays five hundred million annually to the unemployed. We do not pay a dollar to the unemployed here, and if one should go into one of the great industrial centers of this country, where there are a large number of unemployed, I would not think he would make very much of an impression upon the audience he addressed if he told them that we are making this agreement with Great Britain because of her heavy expenditures, including five hundred million she annually pays to her unemployed.

Mr. SMOOT. That was only mentioned as showing the burdens Great Britain is carrying to-day. I do not think I could make very much of an impression before an audience by saying that England was owing $800 for every man, woman, and child in that country. I do not know that I could make any impression upon an audience by saying that between the years 1914 and 1920 her expenses were greater than they were for the 226 years preceding that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That prompts me to inquire, if the Senator will pardon another interruption, speaking about the expenditures Great Britain has to make, just about how much she is obliged to expend annually in the territories over which she secured mandates by the treaty, over and above her revenues from those countries?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not answer that question, because I have not the figures with me. If I had the British budget before me, which I have not, I would gladly answer the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a very considerable amount, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is considerable. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in his able address here to-day stated that the British debt was not a debt for dollars sent to Europe, that the money was all expended here, most of it for cotton and wheat and food products and munitions of war. I know this question has been discussed throughout the country considerably, and I think it would be proper at this time to call attention to the fact that during that short period of time England spent in this country, either directly for England or for her allies, $7,219,408,669.94.

Mr. POMERENE. What period was that?

Mr. SMOOT. During the period of the war, beginning with the first loan we made her.

Mr. POMERENE. She also made expenditures in this country before we got into the war.

Mr. SMOOT. This is after we began to make loans to England and to her allies, and they consisted of these items:

Munitions, including remounts	$1,330,607,883.09
Munitions for other governments	205,495,801.10
Exchange in cotton purchases	1,682,419,875.31
For cereals	1,375,379,343.57
Tobacco	99,174,858.34
Other supplies	215,331,787.01
For transportation, shipping	48,890,000.00
For reimbursements	19,302,357.55
For interest	337,732,633.50
Maturities	353,501,561.61
Relief	16,000,000.00
Silver	261,643,388.41
Food for Northern Russia	7,029,965.94
Total	7,219,408,669.94

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator from Utah a list of the expenditures made by this Government in Great Britain as a result of our participation in the war, and also a list of the moneys expended by this Government in France, to the French people and the French Government, by reason of our participation in the war?

Mr. SMOOT. No, I have not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the commission received from the British Government a table of their expenditures in this country as a result of their participation in the World War, but made no inquiry as to how much money the American Government spent in Great Britain or in France?

Mr. SMOOT. This country spent in Great Britain and France just what she had to spend on account of her men being in the war. She did buy from Spain some blankets and a few other commodities which we could not furnish the Army at the time, but as far as any expenditure is concerned, outside of the expenses actually necessary for the maintenance of our men, mind you, we sent all the foodstuffs they used, we sent all the clothing they needed——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am asking the Senator for facts. Everybody knows we spent money. The Senator has given the amount Great Britain spent in this country. Now I am asking him to state what we spent in Great Britain and France. It is a fair question, and we ought to have that information.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think I could find the information. I want to say this, that this is not information which came from Great Britain. This is information which the Senator can find in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. These purchases were made, and a record of the amounts kept, because of the fact that there was a requirement that every dollar advanced and every sale made to every foreign country, not only to Great Britain, but to any foreign country, should be reported to our Government, and we knew just who spent the money, how much it amounted to, and to whom the supplies were sent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, one of the difficulties I have experienced, as a member of the Finance Committee, in getting the information which led to the formation of its judgment by the Debt Commission, is that the only information available is the financial liabilities of Great Britain, which everybody knows is great. Everybody knows she is suffering from very heavy tax burdens. We have heard a great deal about the liabilities of Great Britain, but not one word about the assets, about the resources. I never before heard of one man settling a debt with another upon his present available cash, and not upon the basis of his real assets, including his possessions and ownership of resources and other tangible properties.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimated value of Great Britain is $80,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. How much?

Mr. SMOOT. Eighty billion dollars.

Mr. BORAH. What does the Senator include in that?

Mr. SMOOT. Everything that she owns outside of her colonies.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean her colonies and all her resources?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am speaking of Great Britain alone.

Mr. BORAH. Oh!

Mr. SMOOT. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. We are settling with her.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusettes. The British Isles?

Mr. SMOOT. The colonies have nothing whatever to do with this settlement. They are not responsible in any way, shape, or form for the obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator claim that the colonies are not a valuable asset to Great Britain?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. While I am on my feet, if the Senator is through with that line of argument, may I call his attention to a phrase in this bill I would like to get his opinion about?

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to answer any question that I can answer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to call the Senator's attention to the last paragraph on page 3, and ask him the meaning of the clause, commencing on line 16. I will read the paragraph first, and then ask the Senator a specific question. The paragraph reads:

> Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest, is hereby approved and authorized.

I think it was explained pretty fully to the committee just what that meant, and I do not propose to ask any questions at this time about that part of this paragraph. But, continuing, the paragraph seems to inject an entirely different subject matter. It reads:

> And settlements, similar, but not more favorable in terms, with other governments indebted to the United States, as set forth in this section, are hereby authorized to be made, subject to the approval of the President.

Do I understand that language to mean that the debt commission can make no settlement with France or Belgium or Italy or any other country on any terms more favorable than those named in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what those words mean, in my opinion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This is of interest, I might say, to my Democratic colleagues because of the fact that a Democrat has offered an amendment proposing that this commission be increased by putting two Democrats on it. If this language means what it is said it means, and what I think it means, what is there left for two Democrats on that commission to do? This bill fixes the rate of interest and the terms, and practically announces to the world the exact terms on which every other debt is going to be settled, because no more favorable terms can be made to any government.

Mr. KING. They might protest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They might protest. We are agreed, and there is no doubt about it, that this act is an announcement to every government that before they come in and sit down with our commission to talk over the refunding of their debts, they have already declared that no one, nowhere, no matter what their financial status may be, no matter how bankrupt they may be, no matter how impoverished they may be, no matter how they suffered during the war, is going to get better terms than Great Britain. Is that true?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the conditions of the original law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Wait until I answer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has answered.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator objects to my replying, he may proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator may explain his answer, but he has answered. He has said it is true.

Mr. SMOOT. The original law gave notice to all of the countries that they could not have any better settlement than 4½ per cent interest, and for a 25-year period, with the interest added to the principal. That is what the original law provided.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the law enacted during the war?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not during the war; after the war. It was enacted, I think, in 1921.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it was enacted in February, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct. In February, 1922, the law was enacted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have that law before me.

Mr. SMOOT. That is when the law was enacted, and the Senator was out of the Chamber when I discussed that question in my remarks when I first began. The commission did not have any power or authority to make a settlement with Great Britain on the terms provided for in the pending bill. The commission never has undertaken to say that it had that authority.

The commission stated it would recommend such a settlement to the President and ask the President of the United States to recommend it to the Congress. That is what it did. The Senator will remember that when the original bill was presented to the Senate, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] made the statement that he was perfectly willing to have the bill passed because they could not make a settlement upon the terms of the bill and would have to come to Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Come back to the Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. That is exactly what the House has proposed to do by the amendment. By the amendment the House has virtually said—not the commission, but the House of Representatives—that the commission shall not have the power to make any better settlement with any country than can be made under the pending bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I call the Senator's attention to this phase of the question: The previous law, the law creating the commission which put certain limitations upon its power, was general and was in the nature of advice to the commission as to the attitude of Congress before any settlements were taken into account. But, now, with the passage of this bill, fixing the terms for Great Britain and with this clause in it, I ask the Senator if we would not be morally and legally bound in honor to Great Britain to make no different terms with any other nation than those named here? Of course, we could come back to Congress with a different refunding bill for Belgium, or France, or any other country. But this clause in the bill, refunding the debt to Great Britain, says that no different terms shall be made with any other country, and I ask the Senator again, are we not morally bound to Great Britain to make no other terms with any other country?

Mr. SMOOT. I say frankly we are not morally bound, and I know that Great Britain will never consider us morally bound. Of course England, I suppose, would like to have, although I am saying it without any authority whatever, a favored-nation clause put into the law, but the Senator knows the commission would never bring such a proposition to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Did the House put it in?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the House put it in the bill. If the Senator will look at the bill which I introduced in the Senate and which was introduced by Congressman BURTON of Ohio, in the House he will not find those words.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the refunding commission has never passed upon that aspect of this legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. It has not, and not only that——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has the Senator from Utah as a member of the commission any opinion as to the wisdom of that clause incorporated in the bill by the House?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think it is necessary at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does not the Senator think that with it omitted from the bill we would be in a position to deal with more freedom of action with other nations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think so, because I do not think we are going to have a better settlement with any country than we have had with England, as I said before. I am quite frank in saying that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But does not the Senator think it might be possible that circumstances would develop that we ought to make a more favorable settlement with some other country than we made with Great Britain?

Mr. SMOOT. When the Senator was out of the Chamber I made the statement, and I make it again, that I know of countries owing the United States as to which we would be delighted if they could give security and pay us the face of the obligation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yet the Senator does not think the incorporation of the clause would affect the commission in its negotiations with those countries?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least, because we could not promise them anything except that we would come back to Congress and tell why we recommended it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What purpose is there in putting the clause in the bill if it is not notice by Congress to the commission and to Great Britain and to the other countries, Great Britain particularly, that the terms named here are as favorable as any other country can get?

Mr. SMOOT. It is at least a notice to the commission. Of course, every country would take notice of those words, just as they took note of the original act; and yet when we extended the invitation to France, she sent a delegation here, knowing that she could not meet the terms of the original act and that it was impossible for her to do so; and that would be the case in the future with other countries if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the phrase means nothing except notice to the commission that the terms we have named in the act of 1921 are now modified, why put it in the bill? Why not leave the language as it was?

Mr. SMOOT. The House thought it was necessary and the House put the language in.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the provision may have very great importance. It is proposed to incorporate in the bill authorizing a settlement with great Britain language which in effect declares that the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States will not enter into a settlement with any other nation more favorable to that nation than the one made with the British Government. It is or may be considered a declaration by the United States that in the adjustment of these debts no discrimination will be practiced by our Government against the British Government.

Now, if it is known that in future negotiations it may become necessary, in order to effect settlements at all, to accord more liberal terms to other governments than those accorded the British Government in this settlement, prudence and fairness to the British Government requires that the provision go out of the bill. Otherwise we will find a just resentment expressed by the British Government after the settlement has been consummated, if it is consummated, against any attempt to accord more favorable terms to other governments.

I think the provision ought to go out of the bill and that each settlement ought to be made on the basis of its merits. The commission ought to be left free, in the event it finds the best interests of the United States require that course, to negotiate for more liberal settlements with other governments less able to pay than is the British Government.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator if it is not his opinion that with that clause in the law, which defines our financial obligations with Great Britain, it amounts to a moral obligation that this Government in negotiating the settlement of debts with other nations will not grant any more favorable terms?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is in legal effect a pledge that, Great Britain having taken the initiative, having made the first move of all governments indebted to the United States to settle, we will take such action as will not prove discriminatory against the British Government. I can not see where such a provision can perform any useful service, and I can see where it may cause dissatisfaction upon the part of the British Government after the settlement has been effected.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I am personally concerned, if I had written the bill those words would not be in it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the sole purpose of the language is to limit the power of the commission, and if it is the desire to retain a limitation upon the powers of the commission, it would be a very simple proposition to adopt appropriate language which would make that particular object very plain, as, for instance, "the commission shall not grant better terms to any other country unless it shall first obtain the consent of Congress." Then plainly the words would be a mere limitation upon the commission and would imply the right of the American Congress at any time to change them.

Mr. ROBINSON. As the bill is now presented, I think the language to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called attention is not beneficial. I think it is harmful. It will not only prevent the commission from exercising discretion which it may be compelled to exercise in order to secure settlements of any kind with other governments, but it will form a just basis for some degree of complaint on the part of the British Government if the settlement is effectuated and subsequently more liberal terms are made with other governments.

Mr. REED of Missouri. May I be permitted to call attention to this point while the Senator is on his feet——

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator from Missouri that if the purpose of the Congress of the United States is to say that the commission shall effect a settlement only in accord with the terms authorized by Congress, then the language ought to be made such that the commission can not do otherwise. All adjustments of debts due the United States should be subject to the approval of Congress.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If that is the object, it seems to me that it is not necessary. We already have a law which provides the terms and conditions upon which all of these debts may be settled by the commission without coming back to Congress. That, of course, requires the high rate of interest and a short time. Those are the present limitations upon the commission. The commission, finding itself confronted with that limit in the matter of its right to act, had to come back to Congress with the matter. So if there is nothing said in the bill with reference to it any future negotiations would be governed by that law. If it wants to make better terms or, indeed, as good terms with France or Belgium or any other country, the commission must come back and get the authority of Congress. So the words used are surplusage.

Mr. ROBINSON. I agree with the Senator from Missouri. If it is impossible to apply the provisions of the act of February 17, 1922, to the British Government and to adjust the settlement according to the terms of that act, it is unwise to continue in force the provisions of the act of February, 1922, as to governments less favorably situated with respect to their ability to pay their debts than is the British Government.

Mr. SMOOT. But this is an amendment of that act.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand, and the effect would be this: If the bill as now presented shall be enacted into law, it would authorize more favorable terms than those under which the commission may now legally settle claims with other governments. But we all recognize the fact that even the terms contained in the bill are impossible of effectuation with certain other governments indebted to the United States.

I maintain that the sensible and the practical thing to do is to require the commission to bring its proposed settlements to the Congress for approval. Strike this language out of the present bill and modify the act of February, 1922, so that the commission may have more liberal authority in the performance of its duty, subject always to the approval of the Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that the commission has never promised any government that it had the power even to settle on the terms which the commission agreed they would recommend to the President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, the Senator from Arkansas well understands that, but the Senator from Utah should understand that when an agency of the Government of the United States completes a negotiation and submits it to the Congress of the United States the issue is quite different from the original issue as to what the terms of the settlement should be. The economic and the political issues are both quite different.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With deference I desire to say that I did not give to the language of the bill the significance which seems to have been attached to it by some of my colleagues. I did not interpret it as anything like a guaranty to the Government of Great Britain that other nations should not be more favorably treated. I understood the purpose of the provision in the bill to be this: Under the existing law no settlement could be made with any of the other nations except at the rate prescribed in the act of February, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, 4¼ per cent. Now, the settlement being effected with Great Britain at 3 and 3½ per cent, it was intended to give the commission the authority to settle with any other government on terms just exactly as favorable. That is to say, instead of making an agreement with other governments to pay 4¼ per cent interest, the commission was authorized to make settlement with other governments at 3 and 3½ per cent, and that without reporting to Congress at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if a settlement were made upon terms more favorable than 3 or 3½ per cent, then the commission would have to come to Congress for ratification. So I think, Mr. President, that although the language here is perhaps not altogether clear, though it may be a little ambiguous, the idea certainly ought to be embodied in the legislation, namely, that no harsher terms shall be exacted of any nation than those upon which we settle with the Government of Great Britain. If we strike out the words, the only authority the funding commission would have would be the authority under the prior act which would require them to exact not less than 4¼ per cent interest.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the language reads "settlements similar but not more favorable in terms."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the language we should have to follow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes—"similar but not more favorable in terms."

Mr. SMOOT. With those words stricken out, it would read:

> Approved and authorized, and settlements similar in terms with other governments indebted to the United States, as set forth in this section, are hereby authorized to be made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I supposed the discussion embraced the terms "settlements similar but not more favorable in terms."

Mr. SMOOT. Those words were inserted in the House.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The point I wished to make was that the commission ought to be vested with a more liberal authority than that with which it is invested by the present law. It ought to be vested with authority to make settlements with the other governments no more onerous than those exacted from Great Britain.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator from Montana that that is the intention of those words. If the words "not more favorable" shall be stricken out, the clause will read:

And settlements similar in terms with other governments indebted to the United States, as set forth in this section, are hereby authorized to be made, subject to the approval of the President.

In other words, if your commission could settle, we will say, with any other of our foreign debtors on similar terms as found in this section as amended, then they would be enabled to do so with the approval of the President, and would not have to come back to Congress; but if the President disapproved of it or if the terms were different from those contained in the pending bill as finally enacted, then the commission would have to come back to Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would say, with respect to that, I think the word "similar" is not sufficiently well defined to serve the purpose. I think that something in addition to that ought to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have given that much thought, but if we do not use the word "similar" and do use some more definite word than that, we could not change the annual payments; the annual payments would have to be just exactly the same as enumerated in the bill. The word "similar," however, will certainly cover the 3 per cent and 3½ per cent and the real fundamentals of a settlement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The trouble about that is, if we merely say the settlements shall be "similar" and the bonds go out on the market, the question would then be raised as to whether the terms were indeed similar, raising a doubt that ought not attach to any securities of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the further indulgence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I desire to say that I agree that what was probably in mind when the provision was prepared was a relaxation of the limitation on the authority of the commission so as better to enable it to effect settlements. I maintain, however, that the difficulty goes deeper and is more important than this consideration. This settlement is a contract with one of the great governments of the world. It is, in the language employed, in the nature of an agreement that we will not discriminate against that Government; that we are making the same or substantially the same settlement with Great Britain that we shall make with other debtors of the United States. I can readily conceive how, if it becomes necessary for the United States to remit a portion of the principal due from other governments, Great Britain may declare "You have violated the contract that you made with us; you have discriminated against Great Britain."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas there?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I merely wish to suggest that there is not a sentence, not a word in the whole bill, until we get to the clause we are discussing, but speaks of Great Britain. Why is not Great Britain going to read this particular clause in the light of all that has gone before, namely, the contract between Great Britain and the United States? That is all the act is. There is not a word about any other debt except Great Britain's debt. It is not a separate sentence, but it is part of the sentence which says Great Britain in payment for this debt can deliver bonds which we have issued.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to that. Great Britain will be justified in saying, and she will put no other construction upon it than saying, "You gave me your pledge; it is part of my contract; here it is in writing; you said you would not make any different terms with any other nation."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that interpretation of the provision is justified from a consideration of the fact that one of the basic principles underlying this whole problem is the maintenance of the integrity of the Governments which are indebted to the United States. I can readily conceive how Great Britain, taking the initiative in effecting these settlements, might desire that other Governments should stand upon the same ground, and might feel that the integrity of national obligations was a question worthy of very great consideration. I think we will find ourselves confronted with this difficulty: If, for instance, a settlement with Serbia should be so adjusted as to cancel a portion of that nation's indebtedness to us because she can not pay and different terms should be effectuated for the settlement than those agreed to with respect to Great Britain, we will find the British Government declaring that the United States has broken faith with her; that she has promised as a part of the program for these settlements to maintain national integrity the integrity of national obligations. It is a consideration that can not be treated lightly.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Is it not absolutely certain that, if there is a difference of opinion now on the floor of the Senate with reference to the meaning of these words, there will certainly be a difference of opinion some years from now or some months from now when we make settlements with other Governments. We are not in a position where we need to permit such a question to arise; we are now making this agreement, and if a difference has already arisen over an ambiguity of language we ought to remove it; that is all there is about it; there ought not to be any question left that raises a doubt in the minds of intelligent men.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask the Senate to pass this question over to-night. I again say that the words "but not more favorable" were put in by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. In the meantime I will try to get the opinion of members of that committee as to why those words should go in the bill. I will frankly say I see no reason why they should. The bill which I first introduced did not contain those words at all; the bill which was originally introduced in the other House by Representative BURTON did not contain those words, but they were put in there for a purpose by the Ways and Means Committee of the House. I ask now that I do not be interrupted any further by a discussion of this particular matter.

Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom,

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there is one reason, possibly, for retaining the last clause, which is the same reason practically as was given for fixing a limitation upon the commission in the previous law, namely, so that the commission would have to come back to Congress for the ratification of any agreement it might make. If we strike those words out of the bill, even if we could make exactly the same kind of arrangement with another nation, as the law is proposed now to be amended, I think we might have some difficulty. I do not expect, and I do not think anyone else expects, that we can make an agreement with any nation upon the face of the earth which is indebted to us that will be as favorable to this country as the agreement with Great Britain. I do not think any other one of the debtor nations is in a position to make as favorable an agreement with us. I might say in connection with that that I hope the commission will have added members in accordance with an amendment which has been offered, not to this bill but to the original bill——

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment has also been offered to this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that both sides of the Chamber may be represented. I want to say that I believe we had better leave those words in the bill as they now stand, as an indication to the countries of the world that we desire to treat them all alike if it is possible to do so. Personally, I do not think it is possible for us to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Before passing from this question I think it ought to be stated that undoubtedly the pending bill takes away from Congress any further jurisdiction over the settlement of debts due the United States from other governments. It provides that if a settlement shall be negotiated by the commission upon the mere approval of the President of the United States that settlement shall take effect. I inquire of every Senator who hears me what is the justification for that policy and that provision? From the beginning of this Government the Congress of the United States, particularly the House of Representatives, has been regarded as the guardian of the purse strings of this Government. What can be the justification of denying to Congress the privilege of passing upon an adjustment of our foreign loans which may involve millions or hundreds of millions of dollars and which will involve in some sense the question of the integrity of the nations which are indebted to the United States?

I believe that the present settlement, while it is objectionable in some of its aspects in view of the course that the matter has taken, should be consummated. I believe the Congress of the United States ought not to be deprived of the opportunity of passing upon future settlements of this nature, just as it has not been deprived of the opportunity of passing upon this settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; then let us change the present bill so as to provide that the commission may go forward with its negotiations, exercising its sound judgment and performing the best service that it can in behalf of the United States, and require all settlements negotiated by the commission to be submitted to the Congress of the United States and ratified or rejected according to the judgment of the representatives of the people of the United States, who have some interest in this subject, notwithstanding the course the matter has taken.

In this connection may I also say that I do not regard the settlement of debts due the United States by other governments as a political question. Those controversies should be determined solely from a consideration of what is best for the interests of the United States and what is fair to the nations that owe the United States. But, Mr. President, the course that the administration has taken in regard to the settlement of these debts has been calculated, if not designed, to provoke political controversy. When this great problem was first attempted to be adjusted, when the Congress passed the act under which the commission is presumed to be operating, it was not in the mind of Senators that a partisan commission should be created. It was expected both by the Congress and by the people of the Nation that the subject should be dealt with as one affecting the Government of the United States, affecting the general interests of the Nation, and that it should be disposed of as far as possible free from political considerations. But the Executive, in the selection of the commission authorized to execute the mandate of the Congress in the settlement of these debts, made it a partisan commission; and now, after the difficulties have become apparent, after it has become manifest to everyone that partisanship and political considerations should be abandoned and the subject dealt with solely with regard to the national interest, we hear it declared that there is objection to putting Democrats on the commission.

For my part, I am not greatly interested in such an amendment at this time. After the settlement of controlling importance has been effected, after the real issues of the matter have been determined, I am not greatly interested in having the commission made a bipartisan commission in order to give force and effect to the partisan action already taken.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Senator from Utah has the floor. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ROBINSON. With the indulgence of the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator's reference to a nonpartisan commission to handle this matter is one in which I have been very much interested. I agree with him that this should not be a partisan matter. While I think the President did wrong in not putting some Democrats on the commission at the beginning, I do not think it is too late now to have the minority represented; and I hope the Senator from Arkansas will not oppose the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not consider that feature of the discussion of the greatest importance. As I have already stated, the settlement with Great Britain is the important settlement. It has been negotiated; and I do not know that it is of very great consequence whether in the future settlements the negotiations be conducted by a bipartisan commission or not, in view of the course the matter has taken. I will say, however, that notwithstanding the effort upon the part of the administration to make it a political issue—perhaps I should not say "effort" but I should say "invitation"—notwithstanding the refusal of the Executive to accord to the minority representation upon this commission, whose duties are of the very greatest importance in so far as they affect the interests of the Treasury of the United States, my purpose is to take that course which is best calculated to promote the interests of the United States. My purpose is to forget the attempt of the administration—the invitation of the administration—to make it a political issue by denying to the minority representation upon the commission; and I hope when the bill is finally voted upon to be in a position to support the settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I stated before, I should like very much now to conclude my remarks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. For a question only.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that matter is disposed of, even though temporarily, I should like to inquire of the Senator concerning the significance and importance of the clause immediately adjacent to that which has been the subject of discussion, namely:

> Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest.

That is to say, as I understand, the Government of Great Britain is given the option to make its payments required hereunder either in cash or in bonds of the United States. In order to get the bonds of the United States it must go out into the market, of course, and purchase those bonds. They are now sold all practically at par. Of course, if they should go above par, Great Britain obviously will not go out into the market and buy the bonds and make payment in that way. She will do so only when the bonds of the United States are selling on the market below par. That is to say, if at some time in the future the credit of the United States, by reason of adverse conditions of trade and difficulties and embarrassments which may surround its operations in one way or another, or by reason of world conditions, should be depressed upon the market, and the credit of the United States should be thus impaired as thus evidenced, then the Government of Great Britain could go out, take advantage of the embarrassment of the credit of the United States, buy bonds, and pay in bonds. I ask the Senator what was the reason for inserting such a provision as that in the settlement?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the privilege granted to Great Britain to pay the principal or the interest upon her bonds in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, was granted because I can not conceive of a time from now on when we are going to issue bonds that will be below par; but, even though they were below par, we do not want to speculate upon Great Britain in paying a debt that was created here during the war. I can see no wrong whatever, no inconsistency, in saying to Great Britain: "In the payment of the interest and the principal, we are perfectly willing to take our bonds issued after April 6, 1917, at par." Of course there are some bonds that were issued before 1917 drawing 2 per cent, with circulating privileges, and there are some 3 per cent bonds. We do not bring in those bonds. We are not including short-time certificates. It is only bonds of the United States issued after April 6, 1917, all of them drawing as high a rate of interest as we have in this bill, and higher.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Am I right in the assumption that we could expect no payment in bonds unless the bonds were selling below par?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly the Senator is right; but the mere fact of Great Britain coming into the market and buying the bonds, not by $1,000,000 or $10,000,000, but by $100,000,000, together with the fact that we have a sinking fund and we are purchasing the bonds for that fund will keep those bonds at par.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then it was for the purpose of getting Great Britain to help us preserve the credit of our bonds in the market?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all, Mr. President; it was for the purpose of giving them the privilege, if they wanted to, of paying in bonds, and we would have that many bonds redeemed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, of course. That is what the bill says. That is what the agreement says.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. It will not take me very long to conclude what I have to say, and then the Senator from Massachusets can proceed. I want to get through now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to have the Senator develop this feature of the discussion: I should like to say to the Senator from Montana——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator is going to ask me a question, I will yield; but I do not want him to get into a colloquy with the Senator from Montana in my time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will ask the Senator if he did not, in the Committee on Finance, interpret the language to which the Senator from Montana has just called his attention to mean that this clause gave the British Government the right to buy only such bonds as were issued between April 6, 1917, and the passage of this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I said that I thought it could be construed in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And is it not true that at the request of the committee the Senator from Utah was sent to the telephone to ask the Secretary of the Treasury if that was the meaning of this clause, and his reply from the Secretary of the Treasury was that it was not the meaning of the clause, but that any bonds issued by this Government in the next 62 years—not now—at any rate of interest could be purchased and given in payment for this debt? Is not that the fact?

Mr. SMOOT. In the next 62 years, providing the bonds are not all paid off before that time. That is true; but I do not believe, Mr. President, that the American people, knowing the conditions that exist, knowing how this debt was incurred, knowing the amount of profit that was made out of Great Britain through her purchase of $7,000,000,000 worth of goods in this country, are going to try now to speculate upon the value of our bonds if she desires to purchase them and hold them between interest dates and have them on hand to pay at the time the interest or the amount of the principal becomes due.

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. Whenever you take into consideration the privilege granted here you must also take into consideration the fact that Great Britain can not pile up the money here to pay the amounts agreed upon, and upon a certain day, without its affecting the exchange values of money between countries. Why can not we say to Great Britain: "During those periods, if you want your money invested so that you can secure a little interest upon it, purchase these bonds, and at the end of the period we will take the bonds"? That is what the commission agreed to recommend, and that is what the House says is the proper thing to do, and I believe it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just one question, if the Senator please. As to the stabilization feature of the matter, would not the market be just as well stabilized if the British Government paid the United States in cash and the United States went out into the market and bought the bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. It might, but I do not know whether it would or not. If it were known that Great Britain was buying our bonds——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I did not want the Senator to interpret my question as being critical of the action of the commission necessarily. I want the facts to appear, and every Senator to know just what this bill means. I would also like to have put into the RECORD, for the benefit of Senators, what appeared before the committee, that this clause was inserted at the request of the representatives of the British Government. The Senator agrees to that?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; Mr. President, they asked that this privilege be granted to them. That was one of the first requests that was made. There is nothing to conceal about that. It was a fair, open request, and I can not conceive why anybody should object to it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if he is worried with these questions.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to answer every question I can. All I had in mind was that I would like to get through with what I had to say, and get it into the RECORD, and then at any time in the discussion I would be glad to answer any question I can.

Mr. REED of Missouri. This has to do with the very matter we are discussing. If this clause were not in the bill, the United States would then know with reasonable certainty that on a given date it would get a certain amount of cash from Great Britain. It would know with absolute certainty when its bonds were to mature.

Mr. SMOOT. Whose bonds?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Its own bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. We know that now.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That was part of my statement for the purpose of the conclusion. I repeat, if this clause were not in the bill, we would then know when England was going to pay us certain sums in cash. We would likewise know with absolute certainty when our bonds were going to mature, and we could make all of our fiscal calculations based upon those two known facts. But when you put this clause into the bill, do you not first make it so that we do not know whether we are going to get cash from Great Britain or not, and we can make no calculations for the use of the cash because we do not know we are going to get cash? Second, Great Britain has the right to mature our bonds at will by merely buying them in the market and bringing them to us and insisting that we accept them as cash. Suppose we have arranged our revenues for the purpose of meeting our obligations, and we calculate that within a given period of time Great Britain would pay to us $2,000,000,000 in cash, and that our own obligations came due at a certain time. But when the time comes around when we expect to have that $2,000,000,000 to use, when the period has elapsed, we do not have any cash at all, but we have some of our own bonds which were not then due? Does not that introduce a sort of chaos into all our calculations, and make all our fiscal calculations depend upon the action of the British Government? Is there a bank in the country which would make that kind of a deal?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, certainly, Mr. President. There is not a bank in the country that does not make loans upon demand; not one.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I never knew a bank to make a long-time loan which provided for payment before the fixed maturity without fixing a penalty for the payment before maturity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, banks all over the world make loans on demand. They also make them payable on or before a date. It is about as common as to make 30-day loans.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am talking about long-time loans.

Mr. SMOOT. Loans are not made by banks, of course, to run for 50 or 60 years. Banks generally make them for a year; but the loans are made payable "on or before." The debtors can pay any amount of the loan when they want to.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Some of them.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Let me finish this. I do not want to be misunderstood. I referred to "banks." Perhaps I should have said loan companies. I never knew of a long-time loan being made with a provision for payment in advance of the fixed period which did not attach a penalty for the payment in advance.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not an obligation due the Government of the United States on account of any of the reclamation projects which the Government of the United States will not allow the debtor to settle at any time.

Mr. REED of Missouri. My question was whether the Senator knew of a private individual or a private concern which would make this sort of a loan, a loan where the creditor has the right to pay at any time, not in cash but in securities? There is no parallel.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no need discussing that question; but I wanted to answer the Senator's original question, because it was a question which ought to be answered. He spoke about $2,000,000,000 being paid. There can not be more than one year's interest and one year's principal paid, and that can not be at any time more than $181,000,000.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I said $2,000,000,000 within the period of time, and I was merely illustrating. The details of an illustration never get you anywhere.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; they do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. They will pay a given sum of money within a given period, according to the contract. We will make our plans within that 10 years based upon the cash to come in during that 10-year period. We do not get cash; but we get our bonds, which have not yet matured, and which we may not be prepared to handle.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will proceed now. In any one year the amount can not be more than $181,000,000, and our sinking fund amounts to more than that. If we did not want to purchase bonds for our sinking fund we could take these very bonds England pays and use them as a sinking fund, because the sinking fund was maintained under the practice of the former administration, is obtained under this administration, and will be under any other administration that will come into power, by the purchase of bonds. We do not put the money into a safe and let it lie there. We purchase bonds, and they act as a sinking fund, and as soon as they are purchased by the Government the interest stops. So, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, that can not interfere. If we have the money to spare we can still purchase more than are necessary for the sinking fund. We can take these from England as payment upon the principal of the obligation and stop the payment of interest upon the bonds of this Government.

Mr. President, in order that every Senator may know the details of every obligation of our Government as of January 31, 1923, showing the date of issue, the rate per cent per annum, the principal amount outstanding, the interest rate for each issue, and the average rate of interest per annum, I ask that the table I have in my hand be inserted in the RECORD at this time without reading.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Itemized statement of the public debt as of Jan. 31, 1923, showing (1) date of issue; (2) rate per cent per annum; (3) principal amount outstanding; (4) the interest for 1 year on the outstanding principal at the interest rate for each issue; and (5) the average rate of interest per annum (on the basis of daily Treasury statements).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, several Senators have questioned the amount of interest accrued and unpaid up to December 15, 1922, at the rate of 4¼ per cent. I do not see the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] in the Chamber. He has taken a considerable interest in the question, and claims that he can not figure the interest as stated in the bill. The difficulty with the Senator from Rhode Island is that he did not have the dates on which the obligations were incurred. Of course, if you take the amount of indebtedness, as stated in the bill, of $4,070,818,358.44, and figure on that sum back to the date of the first obligation that was made, the Senator from Rhode Island would be correct in stating that the interest would not be as stated; but I have here the exact dates at which all of the obligations were made, beginning with the first one that was made, April 15, 1919, down to the last one that was made, November 15, 1922. I ask that that be printed as a part of my remarks, so that all Senators can see it, if they so desire.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

$2,643,789,419.86 at 4¼ per cent for 3½ years (Apr. 15, 1919, to Oct. 15, 1922)	$393,263,676.19

Mr. SMOOT. A question arose in the committee as to why we should use the words "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." It was thought that the words "and Ireland" should be stricken from the bill. I now read paragraph 5 of the treaty between Great Britain and Ireland, dated December 6, 1921:

The Irish Free State shall assume liability for the service of the public debt of the United Kingdom as existing at the date hereof and toward payment of war pensions as existing at that date, in such proportion as may be fair and equitable, having regard to any just claims on the part of Ireland by way of set-off or counterclaim, the amount of such sums to be determined in default of agreement by the arbitration of one or more independent persons being citizens of the British Empire.

That, as I said, is taken from paragraph 5 of the article of agreement for the treaty between Great Britain and Ireland dated December 6, 1921. The British Embassy, in reply to an inquiry, stated that the amount of the liability of the Irish Free State has not been settled and will be a subject of long negotiation. Therefore, it is necessary that we use the exact title "The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland." Whatever advantages there may be in the settlement will redound to the credit of Ireland in the same proportion that she is owing Great Britain. I thought, to save further discussion upon that point, I ought to put that in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for me at this time to go into further detail. No doubt during the discussion there will be many questions asked. I want merely to say in closing that the new bonds will be in conventional businesslike form. The Treasury will know in advance the income that may be depended upon in preparing Budget estimates. In considering its financial plans and dealings the Treasury will know what payments may be expected on account of principal, and therefore to what extent the reduction of the debts of the United States may be accomplished from this source.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has just referred to a question that has been discussed in the press, and I think it has also been mentioned in the Congress. Certainly it was discussed while the bill was under consideration in the body at the other end of the Capitol. That is with reference to the form of the bonds. Is the Senator prepared to discuss that in some detail?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I can not say as to details.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will it be the usual form of British bonds?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. It will be the form of our bonds. It will be made payable in gold coin of the United States.

We will write the bonds, and we will put every detail in the bonds. There will be no question about that.

Mr. POMERENE. The bonds will be payable in dollars and not in pounds?

Mr. SMOOT. The bonds will be payable in dollars. In other words, the bonds will be for $4,600,000,000 gold, the same as every bank note is executed and signed to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, are the bonds to be transferable by delivery, or how are they to be treated? Is there any limitation on their transfer in any way? Can the Government transfer them?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course there will be nothing in the bonds to prevent it.

Mr. McKELLAR. They will be negotiable bonds, in other words?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; under the terms of the bonds themselves.

I was asked this afternoon to furnish a copy of the certificate of indebtedness now held by the Government of the United States as to its form, not amount and not for each country. I have in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1920 an exact copy of the certificate of indebtedness now held by the Government of the United States in form as against each and every one of the countries. I ask that this form may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks, so that every Senator, who wants to see the form of obligation now held, will have it before him in the RECORD.

There being no objection the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The following is a skeleton copy of an obligation received under the fourth Liberty bond act:

CERTIFICATE OF INDEBTEDNESS.

$ (amount in figures).

The Government of (name of foreign Government), for value received promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of (number of dollars in words) on demand, with interest from date hereof at the rate of (rate per cent) per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid without deduction for any (name of foreign Government) taxes, present or future, in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York, or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington.

This certificate will be converted by the Government of (name of foreign Government) if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par with an adjustment of accrued interest into an equal par amount of (rate per cent) per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of (name of foreign Government), conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known, respectively, as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act. If bonds of the United States issued under authority of said acts shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4¼ per cent per annum, a proportionate part of the obligations of the Government of (name of foreign Government) of this series acquired by the United States under authority of said acts shall, at the request of said Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into obligations of said Government of (name of foreign Government), bearing interest at a rate exceeding that previously borne by this obligation by the same amount as the interest rate of the bonds of the United States issued upon such conversion exceeds the interest rate of (rate of this obligation) per cent, but not less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

———— ————,

(Signature of representative of foreign Government.)
(For the Government of (name of foreign Government.)

Dated the ——— day of ———.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I would like to propose an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill, and I ask that it may be printed to-night in order that we may have it before us to-morrow. I will state in a general way just what the proposed substitute is. It proposes to amend the title of the bill so that it will be an act to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States of America, and after the enacting clause it simply sets out the terms of this settlement.

This is not an amendment of the proviso of the original act creating the commission. It has been developed here, and I think was generally understood at the time we passed the original act creating the commission, that there would be no final settlement in accordance with the terms and limitations prescribed in that bill, and that settlements would be negotiated from time to time and submitted to the Congress for approval. I was opposed to the creation of any commission at all. I believed that negotiations with foreign governments should be conducted as contemplated by the Constitution—that is, through the executive branch of the Government. Of course, the President of the United States would have a perfect right to call to his assistance the present members of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, or any one else, to aid in the negotiation of any settlement.

It appears now that a settlement has been negotiated with the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It comes before the Congress of the United States for approval. Personally, I feel like voting for its approval, but I do not believe that we should indulge in any legislation here of doubtful construction. I do not see why we should undertake to amend the proviso of the act creating the commission. Let it remain just as it is, and for the purpose for which it was enacted, namely, to authorize the commission to negotiate settlements which should subsequently be presented to Congress for approval.

With that in view, Mr. President, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and also printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES of New Mexico is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That a settlement of the indebtedness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States, as follows:

Principal of notes to be refunded	$4,074,818,358.44
Interest accrued and unpaid up to December 15, 1922, at the rate of 4¼ per cent	629,836,106.99
	4,704,654,465.43
Deduct payments made October 16, 1922, and November 15, 1922, with interest at 4¼ per cent thereon to December 15, 1922	100,526,379.69
	4,604,128,085.74
To be paid in cash	4,128,085.74
Total principal of indebtedness as of December 15, 1922, for which British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government at par	4,600,000,000.00

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000 and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

"The British Government shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of the principal of the bonds on any interest date upon 90 days' previous notice.

"Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates, on December 15 and June 15 of each year: At the rate of 3 per cent per annum payable semi-annually from December 15, 1922, to December 15, 1932, thereafter at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum payable semiannually until final payment.

"For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

"Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest—is hereby approved and authorized."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States of America."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, to effectuate the change in the bill which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] agreed should be made, I submit an amendment, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table. Let me state that the purpose of the amendment is to give the commission authority to negotiate such settlements as the commission may find to be just affecting other debtor nations who may owe the United States, and to make all such settlements subject to the approval of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator from Arkansas allow me to suggest that the amendment be printed in the RECORD, so we may have it there?

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. ROBINSON is to strike out all after the word "settlements," on page 3, line 16, down to the end of line 20 and insert the following: "with other governments indebted to the United States are hereby authorized to be made upon such terms as the commission may believe to be just, subject to the approval of the Congress by act or joint resolution," so as to make the sentence read:

Settlements with other governments indebted to the United States are hereby authorized to be made upon such terms as the commission may believe to be just, subject to the approval of the Congress by act or joint resoultion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; make it 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. I object if the hour is to be fixed at 10 o'clock. Eleven o'clock is early enough.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood the Chair to say 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did say 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. My request was that the Senate recess until 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request was for 10 o'clock.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object to 10 o'clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest that the Senator make it 11 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, then; I will make it 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it stands in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE RUHR VALLEY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before proceeding with the bill that is under consideration I wish to submit a few observations with reference to the situation in the Ruhr Valley.

The Supreme Council met in January, 1921, in Paris, to consider reparations proposals. The French claim was then asserted to be 112,000,000,000 gold marks. It was stated, also, that the French share of the total claim against Germany was 52 per cent, making the total demand on Germany 215,000,000,000 gold marks. The interest and other claims would make it nearly double that, if charged and allowed. Germany proposed to make it 50,000,000,000 gold marks.

A number of conferences were held, subsequently, and resulted in reducing the amount of reparations until finally the irreducible minimum was reached about May 5, 1921, and the amount fixed at 132,000,000,000 gold marks gross.

On May 11, 1921, Germany accepted this ultimatum in a note to the Supreme Council.

She has paid on account, until on August 1, 1922, her reparations debt was brought down to 120,000,000,000 gold marks.

Germany started her printing presses going, with the result that the value of the mark collapsed. She evidently intended to bring that about, and deliberately flooded the country with paper marks. She has brought ruin on her professional and middle classes. She no doubt expected to pay obligations by the use of these paper marks, and repudiation must necessarily follow. She received gold from people of this country to the amount of nearly a billion dollars for some of those marks now worthless. Of course, the more money she makes by the printing-press method the less she has in fact. One dollar in gold will buy to-day 50,000 marks. The number in circulation is increasing at the rate of 20,000,000,000 per day. It is estimated that there are in circulation 2,000,000,000,000.

April 24, 1921, Germany offered to place with the Reparations Commission 150,000,000 marks gold in the form of gold and silver coin and 850,000,000 marks gold in the form of drafts on the treasury. This was when she proposed to make her total engagement 50,000,000,000 marks gold. She had gold then and she has it now. Since her failure to meet her obligations, as agreed on, attributing her plight largely to the decline in the value of the mark, which she deliberately brought about, she has offered to pay what she could in kind, and some payments of that sort were made to some of the Allies. She offered to furnish labor and material to rebuild destroyed towns in France, but no definite decision was reached in that regard. The situation has gone from bad to worse, until France has felt obliged to proceed, substantially, as set forth in the note of the Supreme Council to the German ambassador, dated May 5, 1921, to wit:

Failing fulfillment by the German Government of the above conditions by May 12, to proceed to the occupation of the valley of Ruhr and to take all other military and naval measures that may be required. Such occupation will continue so long as Germany fails to comply with the conditions summarized in paragraph (C).

We are not in possession of all the facts and circumstances; therefore, it seems to me, respecting the justification or the wisdom, from an economic or other point of view, of the course pursued by France may reasonably be questioned. Appreciating this, I venture to say it is believed that France is acting within her rights. If so, what she is doing is a question of expediency, and that France alone should determine.

In the absence of full information regarding all that has taken place and is taking place, no criticism is warranted, and I feel quite certain our advice is not wanted. So far as I have heard there has been no intimation from those in authority that our counsel was desired. If we can not be helpful, which those directly concerned do not seem to believe, we certainly should not volunteer in a situation where more likely we would do harm.

There are a few things we do know.

We know that Germany is responsible for bringing on the most disastrous war of all time in 1914. Her ambition was to make herself a master of nations, and her purpose was conquest.

We know that she was the aggressor in attacking France with sword and every conceivable means of destruction.

We know that she wantonly, wickedly, without cause, violated the pledged neutrality of Belgium.

We know, because we have seen it, we had occasion to know it, that she ruthlessly destroyed whole cities and towns, churches, homes, mines, and fields in Belgium and France, extending over vast areas—as much as four of our States.

We know she enslaved and slew and starved women and children and is responsible for the death of millions of men.

We know that Germany invaded Belgium and France with her armies, employing every engine of destruction conceivable, and was guilty of such atrocities as to arouse the indignation and horror of all civilized people until our own outraged sense of liberty, decency, and justice cried out to stop it.

We know that Germany deliberately and with malice aforethought put the supremacy of right in jeopardy and "imperiled free government everywhere," and by her intolerable aggression showed she respected neither right nor obligation.

It is true that happened under the autocratic power of the Hohenzollerns, her then imperialistic rulers, who flouted the rights of the citizens. That thought merits consideration.

It is now claimed the German people were not responsible for the doings of the militaristic régime in control, but, on the other hand, it is quite generally observed that we have not seen much evidence of regret, nor many admissions of wrong, nor many offers of apology on the part of the German people.

They see their buildings, their homes, their lands, canals, railroads, mines, and industries all intact, and their attitude seems to be rather self-satisfied, with a feeling not of guilt but a sort of consolation that while they did not make a success of the venture they really lost but little, and they see no good reason why they should be held to restitution. They seem to be perfectly willing to evade doing honestly what they have agreed to do.

President Wilson's policy led to the armistice, and that made it unnecessary for the allied armies to go to Berlin and saved Germany from the effects of an invasion by opposing armies; but he only got abuse and the vilest denunciation from Germans at home and in America afterwards.

His broad liberality in dealing with the whole subject toward Germany was rewarded by their total lack of appreciation and violent animosity.

The manner in which German officials and people treated President Wilson might well cause us to pause before tendering our good offices in the present situation.

The truth is I do not believe that Germany, England, France, or Italy attach very much importance to the United States. They look upon us as new, inexperienced, and incompetent to deal with large problems. I rather suspect we have an exaggerated notion of our supposed influence in Europe.

They believe we have resources and some financial strength and may grow up some day to where our opinions may be entitled to some respect, but we are now youthful, and it would not be well to put our young heads along with those of mature years and wisdom gained by centuries of experience and achievement. I do not believe they would really welcome, and I am quite sure they would not appreciate, any assistance we might perchance render, particularly in dealing with sharp differences where no element of cooperation can be brought into play.

Let us proceed a little further with the things we know.

The time came, following some of the events I have mentioned and without discussing the reasons further, when, on April 6, 1917, we went in as champions of right. We raised armed forces totaling 4,800,000 men. We sent 2,086,000 of them across the sea. We raised internal loans from the people amounting to $22,228,118,400. We reloaned to the Allies $9,641,882,204. We gave $400,000,000 to the Red Cross and $700,000,000 for the relief of Belgium.

We know that October 10, 1918, our military forces held 23 per cent of the western front in France.

We know, too, that of our soldiers 77,118 were killed in battle and 221,059 were wounded.

We can not forget that.

We have already expended through the Veterans' Bureau and Public Health Service, as one of the consequences of that war, over $2,000,000,000, and the average monthly payments amount to over $14,000,000.

We know of the dead and wounded of France and the other allies.

We know of the destruction and devastation in France, and I would not now dwell on details, because I would not kindle the fires of hate or revenge. I wish we might get away from those emotions.

We sought no special reparations for ourselves in the settlement of peace.

We stood firmly "for the restoration of right and the assurance of liberty everywhere."

France has expended over 9,000,000,000 marks in restoring the wasted and ruined areas. Germany has only paid to her 1,500,000,000 marks on account of reparations and has made, first partial then complete, default. Justice and right require that Germany should pay the sum finally fixed by the commission after months of inquiry as to her ability to pay and in the light of all the facts and conditions. When she made demand on France in 1871 and set her own terms, France never whined nor bluffed. She went to work and paid in full before it was due—stupendous as the sum was.

The amount as determined Germany should pay is not one-third enough to cover the damage to France's property, to say nothing of the loss of life, for which there never can be compensation. The aggressor, the wrongdoer, was guilty of no ordinary tort in this case. Germany committed a wanton, deadly assault upon Belgium and France and continued it with barbarous frightfulness to the limit of her resources and strength. She did all the damage and committed all the injury she could.

The high court, the arbitrament of arms, the finding of the world, the course of events, resulted in judgment being entered against her.

She fails and refuses to pay. She seems to hold that France's claim was one of damnum absque injuria. The evidences of her ruthless destruction are in plain sight. The traveler has no difficulty in realizing, when going easterly from Paris, when he passes from France and reaches Germany.

There is nothing to do but issue execution and levy the fieri facias.

Germany took Alsace-Lorraine in 1871 as part of her spoils. France takes the Ruhr Valley temporarily to recover the damages decreed to her as her just due in addition to the return of Alsace-Lorraine and other incidental and pro rata settlements.

It is not a case of giving vent to a military spirit or the exercise of military power. It is not a case of dictation by those in authority arbitrarily and irrespective of the opinions of the French people. Prime Minister Poincaré realizes that the people of his country have reached a point where their patience is exhausted, and they do not propose to longer submit to the dilatory methods, the frivolous excuses, the sullen indifference and studied attempts to avoid payment, and the evident purpose to escape the penalty which Germany has adopted. The force behind the authorities is the public opinion of France, and if Poincaré hesitates, he would go as did Briand.

When Germany understands that France is going to stand on and have her rights, Germany will perform her engagement and meet her obligations, not before. France is evidently endeavoring to impress that understanding on her late enemy now, by the only process open to her.

There will be squirming, loud cries for sympathy, shouts of oppression, propaganda to arouse protests, all of which ought to have been thought of in July, 1914, and before November 11, 1918.

The German people look out upon their own country and see it is not scarred or hurt materially. They have the impression the conflict was a draw; that there was no victory. They appear to think France is lucky to escape capture and complete destruction. They will have to be taught that they lost the war, and although they suffered no damage to their property, France and Belgium did not so escape, and a partial restoration of what Germany ruthlessly destroyed must be made as agreed upon when her grip on the throats of France and Belgium was loosened and she was forced to her knees.

Her people engaged in agriculture have their farms and homes unharmed and are now generally free from mortgage or debt. Her capacity for production, her recuperative powers, are very great.

They can understand the language France now speaks to them; they appear deaf to any other. She is talking to them, not in temper, not in violence, but as calmly as the situation permits, she is telling them to pay up, meet their just obligations, satisfy the judgment recorded; and if they refuse, she must take sufficient property upon which she can realize the amount due her.

The duty of the United States in such a case is to recognize that it is not our affair; we are not directly involved; we are on friendly terms with both parties; it would be meddling and impertinent for us even to make a suggestion to either, unless solicited according to the practice in such cases.

There was a time when the United States was in a position of leadership for the establishment of world order and peace. That time has passed. We threw away the opportunity for usefulness and influence in such situations as threaten Europe to-day. More is the pity, we see plainly now. We retired in the face of small difficulties, and shirked our responsibilities. We are now a rank outsider. Anything we might do or say now would be regarded as voluntary interference in affairs that we declined, when we were needed, to concern ourselves about.

Whereas in the past we asked for no favors or rewards, and could stand out as the only disinterested party in any European controversy, to-day our action would be suspected, our motives questioned, and the place likely to be assigned to us would be that of a self-serving, ubiquitous meddler.

The only course open to us now, especially unless our good offices are requested, is to devote our attention to our own affairs and let other countries settle their own problems in their own way.

One other thought:

I have always contended that under the Constitution of the United States, with respect to foreign relations, the President is charged with the responsibility of leadership.

I have always believed that in the discharge of that high duty and the exercise of that clearly expressed authority he ought to move unhindered, and that those in office and out of office owe him loyal support.

I shall expect him to point the way, and, so far as my judgment and conscience will allow, which I hope will be the whole distance, I shall accompany him. Certainly I shall not undertake to embarrass him or impede his progress.

On the contrary, as he moves in the solution of those mighty questions peculiarly within his province, I shall endeavor to go with him. He is not the President of one political party alone; He is the President of the whole country and of all the people and as such his course in these matters of foreign relations I feel it incumbent upon me to make my course if I can, and at least throw no obstacles in his way.

I felt the same way during the administration of his immediate predecessor in office, and I imagine troubled dreams must now come to those who obstructed and thwarted his conclusions and purposes.

SETTLEMENT OF DEBT DUE FROM GREAT BRITAIN.

Perhaps I should not have referred to the matters I have mentioned in connection with the consideration of the proposal for the funding of the debt due to the United States from the Government of Great Britain; but I have felt for some days like saying what I have said on the subject of the Ruhr Valley affair, and it would seem to be about as closely related to the debt settlement as that is to the ship subsidy.

Our World War Foreign Debt Commission has unanimously recommended a settlement with the British Government after negotiations with the representatives of that Government, and after giving the fullest consideration to the problems involved, as set forth by the President in his address to the Congress of February 7.

The President embodied the report of the commission in his address, and stated:

I bring it to you with the earnest recommendation that it be given, so far as legislative procedure will admit, a cordial and prompt approval.

The bill now before us is intended to approve and authorize the settlement of the indebtedness of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States, so recommended by the commission and approved by the President.

It is unnecessary to recite the details of the settlement which have been already mentioned. Summarized, it may be stated that the British Government is to pay in cash $4,128,085.74, and to issue her bonds to the United States at par for the total principal indebtedness as of December 15, 1922, $4,600,000,000. Interest is to be paid December 15 and June 15 of each year at the rate of 3 per cent per annum from June 15, 1923, to December 15, 1932, inclusive, and at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum beginning June 15, 1933, and continuing until final payment.

This Government can readily float at par its bonds bearing the rate of interest specified in this settlement for the period mentioned if issued tax free. It is true that our issues during the war bear a higher rate of interest. These British bonds, however, can be sold, with our indorsement, at par if desired. It is true that we borrowed at a higher rate of interest the money which we loaned to Great Britain; but, while not controlling in the matter, some consideration is due to the fact that the money we loaned was mainly spent in the United States, even though in many instances profiteers were the chief beneficiaries, and to the further fact that the cause with which we became and were associated was advanced by such loans.

In the spirit of good will and cooperation toward the establishment of better world conditions, I strongly favor the settlement recommended by the commission and approved by the President. This is a time when the ideals we have always professed should find practical expression. We should welcome the opportunity to put into practice the broad and generous policy of international cooperation. In doing so we likewise further an enlightened self-interest.

I favor the refunding of these obligations on the terms set forth in the bill.

REMOVALS FROM BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate that a resolution I introduced, asking an investigation be had of the causes of the removal of 27 chiefs of bureaus and the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, went to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee, after putting off from day to day any consideration at all of the resolution, to-day by a strictly party vote declares that no explanation shall be given by this administration of the outrageous removal of these employees; that the committee is willing that the President of these United States, for partisan reasons, shall strike down the good names and reputations of 28 men and women, shall brand them as thieves, shall remove them from office, shall put in their places men and women who are partisan puppets of the present administration, and the matter shall not be permitted to be inquired about by the Senate of the United States.

I think I know, I say now, without threat, some of the reasons why these people were removed, and the names of some who got patronage under that removal, and I am going to call the attention of the Senate to some of them before this week is over if nothing is done. If they want patronage, let them have it. As patronage brokers, let the administration cater to their demands. I have said all the time, if they want the offices, let them have them, but for God's sake let them take them as party spoilsmen, which they are, and not brand with infamy the names of men and women simply because they hold places they want.

One of the Senators who was so anxious to deny us this investigation, I am informed, got part of that patronage. I am perfectly willing, as I have said before, over and over again, to have them take the offices. Take them as spoilsmen, however. Do not brand men and women as thieves in order that you may give party henchmen jobs.

I want to say, Mr. President, that that is not an end of this matter. Of course, there are only 28 of these men and women. They are not powerful in this world. They are not loaded with wealth or influence; but there is certainly a sense of justice somewhere in the world that will whip any administration for outraging the humble and weak just as much as it will for offending the rich and powerful. They need not imagine that they can go into a committee room and stifle an investigation and escape finally, having the world thus know the motives that actuated the administration in doing it.

I do not like to be discourteous, and yet there comes a time when I do not hesitate to be. I do not like to call to the attention of the public an incident that is not creditable to those in high station, but there comes a time when I am not afraid to do it; and we are going to have some information, Mr. President, this committee to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] began his remarks. I got here just at the close of them. I want to state that this afternoon there was a meeting of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, of which I am a member, and I made a motion to report favorably the resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas providing for this investigation. That motion was voted down. The other members of the committee voted against it, and, of course, I was in the minority, and could not report it out.

I want to take this occasion to say that I am thoroughly, heartily, and sincerely in favor of the investigation proposed by the Senator from Arkansas. It ought to be made. Two of these men are from my State, and I know of my personal knowledge that both are men of the highest integrity and the highest standing, unquestioned integrity, and ability. They never ought to have been discharged. It was an outrage upon their rights as citizens and as employees of the Government to discharge them. They never ought to have been discharged, and they ought to be reinstated. They ought to be reinstated with honor, and reinstated with full pay from the beginning, with an apology from the Government, in my judgment, for having been dismissed.

The Senator from Arkansas is exactly right. The time will come when this will be done. These people were dismissed without cause and, as I believe, upon an entire misunderstanding and misrepresentation of the facts. I want to assure the Senator from Arkansas that as a member of that committee I shall continue my efforts to have the resolution reported favorably and shall bring it up at every meeting of the committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand that the resolution was voted down.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was voted down.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then will the Senator bring it on the floor with a minority report?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator do that to-morrow?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will do that to-morrow, if the Senator desires it to be done.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right. Then we will get a chance to let all the Senate go on record as to whether it wants to continue this sham under which the administration is pretending that after a while these men may crawl back like whipped slaves and be given some kind of employment, while their reputations and their futures are damned.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that the chairman of the committee has promised that there will be another meeting of the committee on Thursday morning. I said just now that I would file a minority report to-morrow. I do not know that I can do that unless a majority report is filed to-morrow. Whether or not a minority report would bring it before the Senate under those circumstances, I do not know. If it would, I shall be very glad to do it. If it would not, I shall be glad to take the course that is found to be proper under the circumstances and under the rules of the Senate.

I want to say that I am just as much in favor of the resolution as the Senator from Arkansas is. I think an outrage has been committed against these men, and I will do anything that can be done within the bounds of reason and under the rules of the Senate to bring it up.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know that. When the committee sees fit to turn it down by a purely partisan vote, let us take it on the floor of the Senate; and, if the Senate wants to take the same course, let it do it, but that is not going to end the matter; but let us not let it end in the committee. Let us let it all come here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to confer with the Senator from Arkansas and do whatever he desires about that.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right. I want it here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall do my best to get it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, I am chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which the resolution was referred. This afternoon at a meeting of the committee I proposed that we should put off further consideration of this resolution until Thursday; and I did so, as I explained to the members of the committee present, because I had called upon the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him for any information he had on the subject, in order that I might bring it before the committee to-day in its consideration of the subject. It occurred to me that perhaps information might be obtainable which would convince the committee that the investigation was unnecessary. The Secretary of the Treasury informed me that he expected to have in my hands by to-morrow evening a statement covering all the facts in the case. I shall be pleased to bring it to the attention of the committee at the meeting Thursday, and then they can take action as to whether they care to report the resolution or not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would the Senator be willing at some time during the session to-morrow—any time in the afternoon he would say—to have the committee meet and pass upon the matter again after hearing from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CALDER. I will say that just as soon as I receive the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury I shall call the committee together.

Just let me say one thing in reply to what the Senator from Arkansas has said. He said that a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as I understood it, had profited in the way of patronage as the result of this tremendous dismissal. I do not know whether he referred to the chairman of the committee or not. If he did, as chairman of the committee, I want to say that I would be glad for him to make public the names and the circumstances——

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator vote out the resolution——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator report out my resolution, so that we may bring that fact out?

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that I shall be glad to have the committee pass upon the resolution——

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator vote to bring it out, so that we may develop this fact?

Mr. CALDER. The committee will determine itself, after the information is obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury, whether or not it will report the resolution out.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the Senator if he will vote to bring it out?

Mr. CALDER. The Senator will make no promise to vote for it until the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury arrives, but to-night, this afternoon, or any other time, I will be very glad to have the Senator from Arkansas or any other Senator, or anybody else, give the Senate any information which he has relative to any man I obtained employment for there, either as a result of this dismissal or at any other time.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is one sure way, Mr. President, if the Senator really wants the facts known; let him report the resolution out and I will supply him with the witnesses. There is no use smothering a resolution in the committee and then coming here and saying that we are at liberty to tell what we know. If the committee will report out the resolution, we will furnish a good many valuable and interesting items of information, and I shall be very glad, indeed, if the Senator from New York, who is chairman of the committee, will have it brought out. He can if he wants to, I am sure, and he can smother it if he wants to, I am sure.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is well for the average man and woman who work for the Government that there are Senators and Members of the House who will lend a listening ear and go to the trouble of bringing their cases to the floor of Congress. It is a wholesome thing to see a fight made such as the generous-hearted and distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is making for ill treated and outraged public servants, who have simply been driven out of the positions which they filled well and honorably to make places for somebody's political henchmen back home. Nothing better could be done by either branch of the Congress than to establish the impression that the cause of the humblest citizen is the cause of the Congress and the cause of the country. There is nothing that will drive bolshevism out of the country so quickly, nothing that will destroy anarchy so speedily, as for strong men who represent the sovereign States of this Union to stand up and demand simple justice to the humblest man and woman in the Republic.

Mr. President, I want to commend the course of the Senator from Arkansas, who has taken upon himself the burden of these outraged Government employees who were driven out of their positions without rhyme or reason in order to make places for some Senators' political friends back home, or somebody else's political friends.

Mr. President, it is easy to trump up charges against some poor man or woman in the common walks of life, without influence, maybe, and kick them out of a position—shut the door in their faces and tell them the case is closed—but it is hard to get Republican officials to lay their hands upon a big man of big means. We all know that.

I recall when some time ago I charged that Parker Willis was on the Federal reserve pay roll and was at the same time writing editorials for a New York paper attacking me, a Senator, for fighting the maladministration of the Federal reserve banking system by the Federal Reserve Board. That was amongst the big fry, and nobody ever investigated that. It was stated upon this floor that John Skelton Williams made the charge that William Boyce Thompson, chairman of the finance committee of the Republican campaign in 1920, had borrowed $3,000,000 on a dummy note, but you did nothing about that. William Boyce Thompson has never been interrogated by the constituted authority of the Republican Party. Parker Willis has not been investigated. They are both in the big circle.

Those things go by; but the poor little man and the poor little woman in Washington, giving his or her life to the service of the country, hold places that somebody wants for somebody back home, and they are kicked out; and yet we hear talk about preserving the rules of the civil service. The administration is putting its foot upon them. They are stamping them into the dust. They are ignoring every principle of them.

Mr. President, it is fortunate for the people that there is such a thing as the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party is the friend of the common man. It is the friend of the plain people, men and women. There is no man or woman whose cause is so small that it can not have the friendly and sympathetic attention of the Democratic Party.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Constitutional government——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HEFLIN. In a moment. The welfare of the citizen is the end and aim of constitutional government, and the humblest citizen holding a Government position who has been mistreated by those in authority has the right to have his cause brought to the floor of this august body, the facts disclosed to the Senate and to the country, and let them know that there are men here who will dare to stand up and oppose even Senators who want to kick out an humble man or an humble woman in order to get their places for spoils purposes. I now yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I know the Senator from Alabama would not make a misstatement intentionally; I am sure he would not. He said that Mr. William Boyce Thompson was chairman of the finance committee of the Republican National Committee and at the same time director in the Federal reserve bank in New York.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I did not say just now that he was a director of the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. CALDER. May I just say that Mr. William Boyce Thompson was a director of the Federal reserve bank in New York, but when he became chairman of the finance committee of the Republican National Committee he resigned his directorship. I wanted that to be clear. I thought the Senator said that he was a director in that bank.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not make the charge in what I said that he was a director, but the charge I am making now is that John Skelton Williams wrote a letter to the Baltimore Sun that he was ready to make proof that he borrowed $3,000,000 on a dummy note from a member bank in New York when he was chairman of the finance committee of the Republican Party. Nobody ever denied or investigated that. I stated on this floor that John Skelton Williams was ready to produce the proof; but oh, no, a small thing like that was not investigated. Three million dollars borrowed when the Republican campaign was on by the chairman of the finance committee, borrowed from the banking system in New York City, when nobody could get money on Liberty bonds in the South and West to prevent agriculture from going to ruin! That is the point I am making.

You favored those who were speculating. You favored those who wanted money for corrupt purposes in a campaign. They could borrow it on any sort of a note; but honest men and women in the South and West could not get it, and nobody has ever investigated William Boyce Thompson, nobody has investigated Parker Willis, drawing $6,000 on a Federal reserve pay roll, writing editorials for the New York Journal of Commerce against me, and those who dared to denounce the crooked conduct of certain persons who were administering the Federal reserve banking system on the Federal Reserve Board. But it is all right. You can bristle up and show your courage when you go in and yank one of these little fellows out of a job.

"What are you doing here?"

"I am working for my country. I have been in here for a number of years. I have a record that is clear and good, and I am proud of it. There is not a blot against me. My record is without a blemish."

"I know, but you must get out."

"Why should I get out?"

"Do not ask me any questions; get out."

"Little woman, what are you doing there?"

"I am serving my country as best I can. I have a good record. It is white as the snow. I am complimented upon my work. No fault has been found with it."

"But you must get out."

"For what?"

"Do not ask me any questions."

Is that what happens under Republican rule to those in the humble walks of life? That is civil service with a vengeance, is it not? They put them out, twenty-odd men and women; put them out under charges that they had been doing something wrong against the Government.

Mr. President, no Government has the right to permit those in authority to mistreat those who are rendering faithful service, who have good names, and prize their good names. You have no right to destroy the good name of any man. You have no right to destroy the good name of any woman, I do not care how humble she is. They may live far out in the suburbs of the city; they may live in an humble cabin on the hillside. I do not care how humble their surroundings are, if they have been mistreated their cause is the cause of Congress; it is my cause; it is the cause of my party and my country. The Government that wants to live on and on can make every heart love it and every hand ready to defend by seeing that absolute justice is done, and that nobody is snatched down and his character destroyed under a spoils system instituted by the party in power.

CREDIT TO DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4308, to authorize the general accounting officers of the United States to allow credit to certain disbursing officers for payments of salary made on properly certified and approved vouchers. I do not think it will lead to any discussion. It is a bill to do an act of justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4308. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not like to have bills coming up this late in the evening, where there is any contest about them, or may be a contest, because it is customary to call such bills up by unanimous consent in the morning hour, or what is equivalent to the morning hour when we take a recess. Then Senators who are watching bills can come in, and they do come in, to protect their rights. In the afternoon, after the unfinished business has been taken up, Senators leave with the idea that there is no danger of their rights being affected.

Of course, when some one asks that we take up and pass a bridge bill, to which nobobdy objects, and which is drawn in accordance with the law, I have no objection. I do not know what is in the Senator's bill, but if we give unanimous consent for the Senator to pass his bill at this time in the evening some other Senator may ask for the consideration of a bill that is contested. That makes it very embarrassing to me.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I withdraw my request for this evening. I wish to say, however, that all of yesterday and to-day, so far as I was able to be on the floor, I was looking for an opportunity to ask for the consideration of the measure in order to do an act of justice to an employee and a veteran. However, I shall endeavor to call it up at the earliest opportunity to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In all probability when I heard the Senator's bill read I would be for it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I am sure the Senator would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But some of my colleagues might not be favorable to it and, merely occupying for a short time longer the floor leadership in the Senate on this side of the Chamber, unless it is a purely pro forma matter, I do not like to have bills come up at this late hour in the evening when a number of our Members have gone away and can not be here to protect their rights. If it is a merely pro forma matter, of course I would have no objection.

Mr. PHIPPS. The Senator's point is well taken, and I withdraw the request.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the particular bill to which he refers was reported only yesterday and that there is no report in the files of Senators.

Mr. PHIPPS. The report has been printed to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will see to it that Senators are supplied with copies, so we may know what the bill is.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] last week gave notice that it was the intention to hold a night session to-morrow. I want to state that it is still the intention to hold a night session to-morrow. We would like very much to continue the session right through and not recess, and in that way we could probably adjourn about 10 o'clock in the evening.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator expect to get through with the debt-settlement question to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. I hope so.

Mr. HEFLIN. By to-morrow night?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; by to-morrow night. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the idea of holding a night session is to get through with the bill to-morrow if possible.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator what action was taken with regard to the provision in the pending bill as to the settlement being conclusive on all other nations?

Mr. SMOOT. No action has been taken; but I will state, so that the Senate may know, what is my personal opinion relative to that provision. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to strike out all the last part of the paragraph beginning with the words "and settlements." Then the bill would only apply, with the amendment which has already been reported by the committee, to the settlement of the British debt. The committee has not acted upon it, and that is only an expression of my own personal opinion.

Mr. OWEN. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah whether that condition was inserted in the bill at the request of the British representatives?

Mr. SMOOT. It was not. It was placed in the bill by the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, simply for the information of the Senator from Oklahoma, I will state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] offered an amendment to that provision to-day which I presume will come up at the proper time.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 14, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 13, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, thou hast relped us and not we ourselves. Because Thy good hand is upon us we are continued unto this day. Let Thy forgiveness be greater than our guilt. Give us the wise answer to temptation and the right view of every trial. May we have the memory that forgets injuries and the recollection that clings to deeds of kindness. In the light of Thy providence, directed by divine wisdom, we take heart. We bless Thee for the privileges of life, of serving our country, of helpful and abiding associations, of fellowships that have heart of courage and pride that can endure and labor on. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FLORENCE A. DONNELLEY.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration of a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks consideration of the privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 512 (Rept. No. 1589).

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House from and after January 1, 1923, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum for the services of Florence A. Donnelley, whose employment shall be under the direction of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. This provides for the employment of a clerk to the late James R. Mann. The minority leader has been consulted, and I believe there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARTHUR LUCAS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of another privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks consideration of another resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 505 (Rept. No. 1591).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, $50 to Arthur Lucas for special janitor services rendered during the fourth session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. It is the usual resolution providing for janitor service in the office of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

RALPH B. PRATT AND HELEN S. BURROUGHS.

Mr. IRELAND. I have a further resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois submits another resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 499 (Rept. No. 1590).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Ralph B. Pratt the sum of $228.33, and to Helen S. Burroughs the sum of $78.33, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. Sherman E. Burroughs.

Mr. IRELAND. That is the customary resolution for the payment of clerks of a deceased Member.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-nine Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4379. An act to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended;

S. 1031. An act for the relief of Eugene K. Stoudemire;

S. 1280. An act for the relief of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl;

S. 4313. An act for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training practice operation or maintenance of the Army;

S. 4366. An act for the relief of W. Ernest Jarvis;

S. 4248. An act to fix the compensation of employees in post offices for overtime services performed in excess of eight hours daily;

S. 1103. An act for the relief of Frank Vumbaca;

S. 3071. An act to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Edward N. McCarty;

S. 4085. An act for the relief of Samuel H. Butler;

S. 4254. An act for the relief of Elizabeth McKeller;

S. 661. An act for the relief of Arthur Frost;

S. 4310. An act for the relief of the owners of the steamship Mohican;

S. 3805. An act to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to ascertain the cost to the Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, and the amounts expended by it from December 1, 1906, to November 30, 1907, in closing and controlling the break in the Colorado River; and

S. 4311. An act for the relief of the owners of the steam lighter Comport.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 10003) to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2531) to create a board of accountancy for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

PUBLIC SHOOTING GROUNDS.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 526 (Rept. No. 1592).

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5823) entitled "A bill providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds and requiring a Federal license to hunt them." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be divided between those for and against the bill, it shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall report the bill back to the House, and the previous question shall be considered ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of what is known as the migratory bird bill. It proposes one hour of general debate and the usual consideration under the 5-minute rule.

In 1916 the Federal Government made a migratory bird treaty with the Dominion of Canada. In 1918 we passed an enabling act providing for the execution of this migratory bird treaty. Up to the time of this act the migratory birds were fast disappearing, but as a result of this legislation we are pleased to say that they are returning in increased numbers. And now we are up against the proposition of furnishing proper feeding grounds and game refuges to take care of these birds. The present bill is in a general way complementary to the enabling act that was passed in 1918. With the fast disappearing forests, and swamp lands, the increasing amount of these lands in the hands of private corporations and game clubs, we find for the average every-day hunter, the man who does not feel that he cares to spend the money to join some club, but cares to hunt only occasionally, will soon have no place left for him unless something along this line is done. Therefore one of the general provisions of this bill is to provide public shooting grounds and public game refuges that will be available at various times for all the people throughout the country. The money to provide for these public shooting grounds and game refuges is to come from the sale of Federal licenses to the people who desire to hunt migratory birds. Or, to be more specific, the two main objects of the bill are, first, for the maintenance of marsh and water areas especially suitable for migratory wild fowl, which shall be used as free public shooting grounds in the open season and safeguarded as breeding and resting places for these birds in the closed season; second, the administration of the migratory bird treaty in order to more adequately maintain and increase the supply of migratory birds, including not only ducks, geese, and other classes of game, but the great host of smaller species which are so vitally essential to the agricultural interests of the country.

This bill has been before the country for practically two years and has received the widest publicity. Practically the whole press of the country, every game club, Audubon society, and the conservationists of every part of the country are unanimously in favor of it. There are about 38 different States that have regularly organized conservation commissions and 31 or 32 of them are unanimously in favor of the provisions of this bill. It has the approval of the Agricultural Department and of your Agricultural Committee, and in general terms I might say that it is a safe, sane, practical measure, not only for providing these shooting grounds but for the execution of the migratory bird act; and if it is considered proper to pass it at this time, it will be of inestimable value to the people for all time and will ever increase and maintain an ample supply of wild animal life in this country.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why do we not take up S. 1452 as amended? Would not that insure the final enactment of the bill at this session?

Mr. SNELL. When this rule was originally granted the Senate bill had not passed. It is the intention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], who is in charge of the bill, after the rule is adopted and before the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole, to ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of providing feeding preserves for the birds. The gentleman knows that when wild ducks and wild geese migrate, they migrate according to their own program, just as an airplane goes its way. How are you going to control them in the places where they shall go?

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the fact that you can not control them as to where they will go, but the people who are interested in these game birds know where it is their habit to go, and are going to provide these shooting grounds and refuges in those places.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Would this bill include the Government reservations?

Mr. SNELL. I believe it is intended to offer an amendment, to which there is no objection, to exclude Government reservations.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman accept an amendment of that kind?

Mr. SNELL. I am not in charge of the bill, but I understand that arrangement has been made.

Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] desire time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would be very glad if the gentleman would yield to me 30 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman try to get along with 25 minutes?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me 25 minutes to use as I desire?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman 25 minutes to use as he desires.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker [applause], I am opposed to the legislation for the consideration of which this rule proposes to make provision. Therefore I can see no reason for supporting the rule itself. I do not intend to attempt to enter into any elaborate analysis of the bill H. R. 5823. Its general terms are quite sufficient to cause me to oppose it. In a general way that bill provides that those who hunt migratory birds as defined in the treaty with Great Britain and in the act passed subsequent to that treaty shall be required to take out a Federal license, paying therefor $1; that a portion of the funds derived from these license fees, which are to be collected I believe by the postmasters, are to be invested in the purchase or lease by the Federal Government of lands suitable for game refuges.

Of course this bill has the support of the sportsmen of the country. They are back of it. I like to respect the wishes of the sportsmen of the country. The real sportsman is nearly always a big-hearted, generous, unselfish individual. [Applause.]

But the trouble is that these gentlemen do not realize where this legislation leads to. Earnest as they are, and earnest as are the other societies that are supporting this legislation in their desire to preserve the wild life of the country, they fail to realize the precedent that is fixed here. They fail to appreciate the fact that this is but enhancing Federal power, taking another step toward adding to the restlessness and discontent of the average citizen with the Federal Government. Of course everything that is proposed in this bill could be worked out through the States. There is where it should be worked out. The whole truth is that these earnest people who are interested in this legislation find it easier to turn their batteries upon Washington and bedevil Congress into doing something it ought not to do than to go to the State legislatures and get them to do the thing that the State legislatures ought to do.

And hence we have this new approach, this new step, in the enhancement of Federal power. There are other things in the bill, but I do not wish to take up so much time. The control of fishing is contained in this bill.

Let me say a few words, if I may, to gentlemen from my section of the country in particular. Some months ago we made a determined and bitter fight in this House upon what was known as the antilynching act. We took high constitutional ground. We felt that we were fighting not alone the battles of our own people down there, but battles for the people of all the States in attempting to preserve in their integrity the rights and duties of those States. Let me ask you how long do you think we can continue to yield to the blandishments and propaganda and the temptations of expediency on measures such as this? [Applause.] Enhancing the Federal power instead of standing on our own ground. This rule ought not to be here. It is a thing that we think the Federal Government ought not to deal with; a thing that can be worked out through the States, and ought to be worked out through the States. I tell you now, particularly you gentlemen from my section, that if we continue to pass legislation along these lines we will wake up some morning to find that even the migratory birds have come home to roost. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think that some of the bills on the calendar of this House awaiting action are of much more importance than to take up this bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do, indeed. Why is it that the great national policy can not be fixed, for instance, with regard to Muscle Shoals? [Applause.] Why is it you wish to come here and trifle with these matters that the States can attend to, and ought to attend to, to the neglect of these things which the Nation only can do and ought to do?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman have any information in reference to the great fisheries bill to protect the rights of the natives and inhabitants of Alaska in Alaskan waters that has been reported and is on the calendar?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have some knowledge of that matter—that is a thing that only the Nation can do, and it ought to be under consideration now, as a choice between that measure and this bill.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And the Delegate from Alaska can not get an opportunity for a hearing in this House?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So I understand.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, the only trouble about the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee is that the migratory bird has no respect for any State lines. [Laughter.] If his argument was good that the State should enact this legislation with reference to migratory birds, you might as well apply it to the counties.

What is the subject? It is a subject concerning which our country and a foreign country have had a treaty. Who will place the laws on the statute books to carry out the intent of that treaty? The question answers itself. Will the States do it? One witness appeared before our committee in opposition to this bill. He was an honored Member of this body, a Member of Congress. He said that he was opposed to the bill and opposed to the treaty, because all the migratory birds, practically, in passing from the North to the South alighted on the waters in his district. He testified that he thought the people of that locality should have the right to slaughter and sell the migratory birds. We also had before our committee a gentleman from that section of the country in favor of the bill. He was a game warden, a State officer. He said not to follow the advice of that distinguished Member, although he was our colleague. He called our attention to the fact that, concerning the migratory birds about which these nations have enacted a treaty, in the gentleman's district it would cost me $77 to shoot a duck under their State law, while that gentleman might hunt to his heart's content on a license of $3.

It is not only the sportsmen of America but every game warden of the United States, except a few out in the western section, selected by the governors and the people of the States interested in the preservation for future generations of the migratory birds, who are behind the bill.

The gentleman wants to leave it to the States. If you do, take the example as testified to in the hearings by a game warden of Virginia, who told us that the distinguished gentleman who had testified in opposition to the bill in his district had a State law concerning migratory birds that the residents might hunt them. They did not know the lines when they crossed them. Under the beautiful system as outlined by the gentleman from Carolina, a man living in the District of Columbia or in Kansas shooting a duck in Carolina must pay a license of $77, while the other man can hunt for $3. Gentlemen, this is a national subject. The migratory bird has been deemed a national subject, or our Nation would not have dealt concerning it and made a treaty with a foreign nation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman say that this law will change the licensing system so that it will affect the licenses now in vogue?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I do not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, it will cost the man $78 in that State. [Laughter.]

Mr. TINCHER. That is all right; but this law will permit a refuge in that State where they charge $77 for a license—a Government refuge, where the birds can have protection from the slaughter of the man who wants to kill them and trade them for groceries, as was described by the Congressman who testified before our committee. This is a law looking toward the conservation of a resource which is national in its aspect, and this is the kind of a law that produces an element we have always had to fight when it has been placed on the statute books. It is not only the sportsman. To-day under the law a rich man who can own a preserve can have some assurance that he can hunt. The birds do not belong to the rich nor do they belong to the poor, but a Government refuge where a bird may have protection and where the species may be protected if necessary; and we all know that there will not be such a thing as a migratory bird in a few years—that is, a duck or a goose—if this present system is continued.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How could you protect the bird by having a public shooting ground for it?

Mr. TINCHER. The public shooting ground would not so much protect the bird, but this bill provides not only for a public shooting ground where the poor as well as the rich may hunt, but it provides for a refuge where no man can hunt, and the money collected from this tax is to go to the maintenance of that refuge where that species will be protected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I approach this subject under conditions of very considerable embarrassment. With the obligations and responsibilities resting upon me I feel it my duty, have always deemed it my duty, to support, if it is possible to do so and square such support with my conception of my public duty, bills that are reported favorably and rules that are presented by a majority of the Committee on Rules. I would not appear to-day in opposition to this bill and in criticism of the rule, though I shall feel it my duty to vote for the rule because I believe that a measure having as much support as this measure has is entitled to consideration, if it were not for the fact that I believe the measure is so far-reaching in its evil consequences, would be so tremendously harmful in the long run to my country and to its people, that I can not bring myself to support it or any part of it. It is true that the Supreme Court, which held in the Connecticut cases and in the case of Ward against Race Horse that game was the property of the States, that full and exclusive dominion over game was a part of State sovereignty, did later hold by a divided court in connection with the treaty relative to migratory birds that what the Congress could not do through a bill passed by both Houses and signed by the President could be done through a treaty negotiated by the Executive and approved by the Senate. That is the law, and as a good citizen I accept it and shall abide by it until some future day that great court shall decide, as I am confident it will decide, that the Constitution of the United States can not be violated by treaty any more than it can be violated by act of Congress. [Applause.]

It will be a sad day for the Republic when it shall be finally settled, if it shall be, that the great basic principles of the Government may be overturned and set aside by the treaty-making power.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield; my time is brief. It is possible that I have had one letter, but with that possible exception no one has appealed to me against this legislation; on the contrary, I have had, as all Members have had, many appeals in its behalf by associations of hunters or associations of people who are pleased to call themselves conservationists, and so labeling themselves, assume a superior virtue not possessed by those of us who may not agree with their views. That flag, Mr. Speaker, more than any other flag that ever floated, except for the brief period of our great disagreement, has had the loyal support of the people of a great Nation, and it has had that support largely because under it we have been free from those petty, miserable, and vexatious interferences and annoyances that elsewhere and under centralized governments have made law breakers and even anarchists of men who wanted to be good citizens. [Applause.] We have, thank God, up to this good hour in the main escaped the tyranny of petty officials of a centralized government interfering with the rights, the liberties, and the everyday life of the people locally—an interference which by its very character can not well avoid being tyrannical, a control whose source of authority is so far removed from the people locally that against it they feel hopeless, helpless, and resentful. We have here before us a bill which extends Federal police power, authority, and control more than any measure that has appeared in this Chamber, save the Volstead Act, which the people authorized by amending the Constitution and tolerate because it seeks to cure an appalling national evil, and this bill is to be considered in general debate for only 60 minutes—a bill under which the Federal police power of the Nation is extended to the limits of the Republic and over every barefooted boy, and every youth of the land who may go out to shoot blackbirds off the spring crops; a bill under which the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, numberless and far extending in their scope, become the law regulating the activities of every citizen who may at any time be disposed to shoulder a shotgun and hunt a peewee or a pelican, for the term "migratory birds" includes about everything that flies save a bat or an English sparrow. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill out and out. I have been greatly interested in it, however, because it comes from the great Committee on Agriculture, to whom we look for measures for the relief of the farmers; and the voice of our calm and dispassionate colleague from the State of Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], who gives us from time to time the story of the needs and sufferings of the farming communities, has been raised in favor of this bill, which he declares provides a refuge for migratory birds. I beg to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it is not a refuge for migratory birds that this bill provides, but it is a refuge for the hunting clubs of the country. [Applause.] The migratory birds are a secondary affair. Why, gentlemen of the House, in this hour of our trouble, when the question of the relief of the agricultural communities of the country is at stake—when they are asking for relief—why is it that this great committee that has before it matters that would tend to relieve the oppression upon them brings in such a bill as this, which only adds additional taxes, additional offices, and additional revenue agents to harrass the people of the country? When the farmer asks for bread you give him this stone.

Why, a reading of the bill proposed shows that it provides for the establishment of shooting grounds for the public. What right have we to pass this bill? Ah, gentlemen say that it comes from the right which devolves upon us in connection with the treaty between this country and Great Britain. What does that treaty provide? For protecting the migratory birds, not for providing hunting clubs, and this bill attempts to provide protection for birds by establishing hunting clubs in their refuges to kill them. This bill provides for the levying of a tax for licenses, which sum is to be used in the purchase of land throughout this country, water and land, to build up great hunting clubs for the benefit of the suffering farmers in Kansas, I suppose. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, we are bound to respect that treaty and carry it out. I ask gentlemen who have reported this bill to answer me this: Have not we carried it out in the light of the act of July 3, 1918? We legislated then to carry out this treaty. We provided penalties for violating the treaty. What is this bill for? Stripped of all its paraphernalia, it is a bill for the relief of the hunters of this country and not to carry out this migratory bird law. Mr. Speaker, I agree with my friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] we are bound in this matter, because the Supreme Court has declared that the law passed to carry out this migratory bird treaty was a valid law, but that treaty may be repealed by a law of Congress.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUCKER. Well, for a question.

Mr. HERRICK. The gentleman wants information and has asked for it, and I want to give him some information. I would answer the gentleman by saying the bill before us is to take up the time of this House and is a pretense of doing something when we are not doing anything. [Laughter.] The truth is this Congress has legislated upon birds, beasts, bugs, foreigners, and special classes, but we can not legislate for the farmer, the laborer, or the masses—only for the classes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the indorsement of one of the leaders on that side of the House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, in my short legislative career I have discovered that when a Member on the floor of this House wants to oppose a proposition for some reason or other and does not know exactly how to go at it he always hides behind the Constitution, State rights, or Federal regulation. That is the position of gentlemen in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Tennessee stood on the State-rights proposition, while the gentleman from Wyoming stood on the broader proposition of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think the Constitution is really a good thing to stand behind?

Mr. SNELL. I will agree to that, but when you gentlemen do not want to argue proposed legislation you get behind one of those propositions and forget what is in the legislation proposed. There are two classes of people who are opposed to this legislation. I have been through all the hearings before the Agricultural Committee and the debate in the Senate, and I want the Members of this House to know just who are opposing this bill and let them draw their own conclusions. One Member appearing before the Agricultural Committee stated that he came in the interest of the game wardens of seven of the Western States. He said to the Agricultural Committee he did not want to discuss the merits of this bill, but wanted to refer to some resolution presented to him to be presented to the committee, and I want you to know what those resolutions were. They say that they appreciate the intent of the legislation and they are in full support of it; that they approve the purpose and aims of this bill, but they think it is of enough importance to have a Federal appropriation, and they wind up their resolution by saying, "We are in favor of a direct appropriation by the Congress for the purpose of enforcing the migratory bird treaty and the establishment of public shooting grounds and game refuges, etc."

They are in favor of every provision of this bill, but instead of having the man who gets the benefit pay for it, they want the Federal Government to pay for it. There is one other class who is opposed to the passage of this bill and that is represented by a statement made by another gentleman who appeared before the committee, and he simply gave to the committee the information that his people are against any kind of regulation. All they want to do is that they may kill all the wild animal life at any time and sell it in the open market. Now there are the two classes which opposed this legislation. On the other hand, we are presenting you a clean-cut, practical, conservation measure, one that has the unainmous support of 95 per cent of the people of the United States and the game wardens, who say that they who oppose this proposition do not represent one-fortieth of the entire population of the United States; all the other game conservation commissions in the United States are unanimously in favor of this legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. It will provide protection for all time to come and a generous supply of wild-animal life, and it is a measure that is entitled to the careful, conservative consideration of the membership of this House. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I was anxious to know how the gentleman reached the conclusion that nearly 95 per cent of the people of the United States were in favor of the bill. I would like for the gentleman to tell us how he arrives at that estimate.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, I figured up the population of the various States represented by the game wardens who were opposed to it. That is how I got that conclusion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. You got that from the game wardens, but not the people.

Mr. SNELL. From the number of people given in the last census, which these game wardens say they represent, and they are not one-fortieth of the population of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 73.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea." Those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 117, not voting 156, as follows:

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening, and did he fail to hear his name?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I heard my name called, but not in time to vote.

The SPEAKER. The point is whether the gentleman was listening and did not hear his name.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I heard my name called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. BARBOUR. I did not know it was that kind of a call. I supposed it was a no quorum call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1452 be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that S. 1452, which the Clerk will report by title, be taken up for consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 1452) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes the gentleman means to ask that this bill take the place of the House bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5823.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5823) providing for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them, with Mr. CRAMTON in the chair.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] such time as he may desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for such time as he desires, not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill. I think there never was a measure before this House which was so positively and emphatically in the best interests of the whole people of this country as this bill is. [Applause.] This is distinctly not in the interest of the gunning clubs or of the few men who own the rich hunting preserves of this country. It is a bill which will some time put the common people of this country on an equality with the men who in the State of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] own every valuable shooting right in the State, so that the poor man of his State has no chance to kill a duck if he wants to. The gentleman's remarks were in the interest of the preservation of those rights to the rich and those who could afford them. This bill will give some opportunity to the poor man to get a chance to shoot a duck if he has that inclination, but above all and beyond that the object of the bill is for the conservation and preservation of the wild fowl of the country.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. In the State of Illinois we have a game license law. Every man who wishes to hunt must take out a license. We have many farmers in Illinois living a few miles from the Mississippi River. Occasionally in the fall of the year after their summer's work is ended they want to take a day or two off and go down to the river to shoot ducks. Does this bill provide that those men will be required to go to the post office and take out a Federal license before they can shoot a wild duck on the Mississippi River?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; they will be required to pay the tremendous sum of $1 for a Federal permit; and I have never yet seen a farmer's boy who loves to shoot ducks who would not gladly pay that dollar if he could be assured of the opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think he ought to ask the membership of the House to vote for a proposition concerning the merits of which he has not yet convinced his own floor leader?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will make a statement in regard to that.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am interested in commercial fishing in the Lake Erie district. I should like to ask the gentleman whether this bill will be amended so as to protect the interests of the commercial fishermen?

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to say a few words about that. I want to say to the House right now that it is evident that some strong interest is fighting this bill. The interest that has gone to the greatest length to oppose this bill is the commercial fishing organizations of the country; and yielding to that great power, which has shown its force on the floor of this House today, I have agreed to strike out of the bill any reference to fish, so that the commercial fishing interests can rest assured that they will not be interfered with on any waters which are set aside as game refuges under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CHALMERS. I have not been fighting the gentleman's bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know that, but others have.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question to see if he can satisfy me on this point: Does a public shooting ground in any way tend to preserve game?

Mr. ANTHONY. It does.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why?

Mr. ANTHONY. A public shooting ground is not the primary purpose of the bill. The primary purpose of the bill is to set aside areas of ground, principally swamp and waste lands which are used as feeding and breeding grounds for the migratory birds, and incidentally to give the whole mass of the people—the poor man, the one-gallus hunter, as you call him—an opportunity to shoot on these public shooting grounds during the open season.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Where will these public shooting grounds be located?

Mr. ANTHONY. They will be scattered all over the country. The principal class of land that would be used for such purposes would be land in swamp areas.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman realize that very few people live in those areas?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And the people who may hunt upon public grounds will have to come from very long distances?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That requires a great deal of money and therefore the poor people will be unable to hunt on these grounds.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the gentleman if a bill providing game refuges but not permitting any game to be shot on these refuges would not better preserve the game?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the intention that certain of these game areas will be set aside as sanctuaries upon which at no time in the year will a shot be fired.

Mr. HILL. None at all?

Mr. ANTHONY. The situation is this: When a duck starts from Canada on its southern migration it is bombarded from every pond and swamp from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. Unless there is some protection afforded, some areas for the birds where they are protected from the hunter, and a few areas where they will be protected for all seasons of the year, the birds must go out of existence. With the rapid drainage of marsh lands, the wild duck will soon have no natural place to live in this country.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman explain one section of the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield a little later.

Mr. HERRICK. I would rather the gentleman would yield now. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HERRICK. Here on page 6, section 10, it says "the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase or rent in the name of the United States such areas as have been approved for purchase or rental by the commission," and so forth. Out of what fund are these areas to be purchased or rented, and where is the appropriation for the purpose?

Mr. ANTHONY. Outside of the initial appropriation of $50,000, there is no money taken out of the Treasury. Under the licensing provision it is expected that there will be about a million dollars a year derived.

Mr. HERRICK. "Expected," but not certain.

Mr. ANTHONY. And 45 per cent can be used for the purchase or lease of these areas.

Mr. HERRICK. If that is the case, why appropriate the initial $50,000? Why not enact a law and depend upon the returns to put it into operation?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will require $50,000 to put the law into operation. Now, I would like the House to notice that there are some material considerations for this bill aside from the philanthropic one of conserving wild life. The House ought to realize the great commercial value of the migratory fowl in this country. I was amazed myself at the hearings before the Agricultural Committee when the game warden of Minnesota said that under the law of his State a hunter who takes out a shooting license each year has to report the number of game birds he has shot the previous year. He said the record would show that last year over 2,000,000 ducks and geese were legally killed during the open season in Minnesota. He placed a value of $1 a head on these ducks and geese. I think that is a little high, but that means in the State of Minnesota alone there was legally killed over $2,000,000 worth of migratory wild fowl, making a total value in the entire country of birds killed legally of easily thirty or forty million dollars each year. So the House will realize that we are conserving a most valuable food supply when it enacts a provision to augment and care for our migratory birds.

When we enacted the law of 1918 supplementing the treaty with Canada we provided for no shooting of wild fowl in the spring. Since that went into effect the supply of ducks and geese have increased 100 per cent.

That is apparent to any man who goes out into the open and shoots. The trouble is that the average man if he wants to shoot wild fowl has no opportuntiy to do it. In my State and practically every State, if there is good duck-shooting ground, there is some gun club or some rich man, able to afford it, who has bought or leased it, and the average man is prevented from exercising that right.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How does this bill prevent that evil?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because under the game refuges that will be created the average man on the payment of a dollar license will be permitted to hunt there in the open season.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But they have that right now in every State of the Union.

Mr. ANTHONY. Eventually under present conditions the rich men will possess all the valuable shooting grounds.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And I understand they want this bill enacted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Many of them want it because, undoubtedly, they desire to conserve the migratory birds.

Mr. DEAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DEAL. If it be a fact that the migratory birds have increased since the treaty has been agreed upon, why should not we go along under the law that we have now? Why do we want any additional law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Because if we do not enact the law it is practically certain, with our continued increase in population and drainage of swamp lands, that the supply of wild fowl will be exhausted.

Mr. DEAL. But the gentleman says that they have been increasing since the treaty.

Mr. ANTHONY. They are, but with the increase of population and people who are shooting them the probability is that they will be wiped out. Canada has already taken the step that we propose to take in fulfillment of the treaty. She has created game refuges in Canada. She charges a small license fee to hunt, and it has been working perfectly in Canada, and I think the increase in the migratory birds is largely due to that fact. I think the increase in the number of birds in this country is largely due to the steps taken by Canada in relation to breeding grounds for wild fowls. Let me say that the natural breeding ground for these birds would be in any place north of this parallel of latitude, but since the birds have been so much persecuted and shot at in the last 20 or 30 years very few of them breed in the United States any more. But, under a law like this, the birds will naturally return and propagate in this country.

Mr. DEAL. And is it not a fact that the increase in these migratory birds has been such that there has been some suggestion already that the law shall be suspended for one or two years in order that they might reduce the number?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have never heard that statement.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. There is such record in the hearings of our committee.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I would like to know the status of the individual hunter in the neighborhood of private game preserves. Here is an area of leased land, for instance, taken by half a dozen men.

Mr. ANTHONY. The individual hunter is absolutely prohibited. I know in my own locality as a boy I used to hunt on a small lake across the river in Missouri. That lake is now owned, half of it by hunters from Kansas City and the other half by others, and the ordinary man can not hunt ducks for miles in that vicinity, unless he goes on the Missouri River.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Could he under this law?

Mr. ANTHONY. There might be areas provided where he could.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman would not want to pass legislation, I take it, that would cause these game birds to cease to be wild. It is the fact that they are shot at from Canada to Mexico that causes them to be wild and teaches them how to take care of themselves.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true. Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised at the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] on this measure. I think he takes the most selfish position on this conservation measure of any man I have heard speak on the subject. The gentleman from Wyoming has within the confines of his own State the Yellowstone Park, the greatest natural game preserve in the world, and from the borders of that great domain all kinds of game overflow onto the lands of his State, where his people have opportunity for the best shooting and sport in the world.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. No other State that I know of has that great advantage, and I am surprised that he does not want to give anybody else the opportunity that he now enjoys. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is not well informed. There is no hunting by anybody at any time within the confines of the Yellowstone.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not make that assertion.

Mr. MONDELL. And it is true that my State, largely, I think I may say, by my influence, has established game preserves covering many hundred thousands of acres, and the other States can do the same.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that instead of opposing further game-conservation measures, the great State of Wyoming ought to take steps to further conserve the game which the Government protects in Yellowstone Park, that overflow into the balance of the State, and where now thousands of elk are permitted to starve to death by the State of Wyoming every winter through lack of food, and these elk ought to be preserved.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in favor of game preservation and have done more to further it probably than any man in this House, but first of all I want to preserve this Republic and the liberties of the people. That is the most important conservation that I know of. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it proposed that the titles of these lands which are provided to be purchased under this bill shall be taken in by the Government of the United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is so proposed, but no land can be secured in any State unless it is approved by the legislature of the State in question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If that were true, then all of the States would lose absolutely all control under their police regulations over those areas.

Mr. ANTHONY. They would not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that provided against in the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. They would lose only such control as is involved in the control over migratory birds.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Should this law be passed, what becomes of the license that the State issues now to the hunter?

Mr. ANTHONY. The State still grants licenses and does as it pleases with the money.

Mr. HULL. The hunter would have no protection under that license. Is not that true?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know what the gentleman means by protection.

Mr. HULL. Suppose a boy has a license from the State of Iowa and goes out and shoots a blackbird; then some Federal inspector or marshal arrests that boy and he is taken in before some judge.

Mr. ANTHONY. Absolutely. He would have to pay a dollar each year for the privilege of hunting any migratory birds.

Mr. HULL. Then he would have to have two licenses?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. To kill blackbirds.

Mr. HULL. And has to follow all of the rules and regulations that the Secretary of Agriculture lays down?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The national law will undoubtedly suspend the State law which will be in conflict with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; the only law will be regulations in reference to these migratory birds.

Mr. LONDON. I know, but every State law or regulation which will be in conflict with that——

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, they have already been contravened by the Federal regulation, and the migratory bird is now under the control of the Federal Government. That has all been decided. That is water that has gone over the dam.

Mr. LONDON. And this is another step in that direction?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have already taken that step, and this goes a little further.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman referred to the fact that a Kansas City club had bought a part of a certain lake near his home, and some other club of hunters had purchased the other half. The gentleman also referred to the fact that in my own State the lands which would naturally be refuges have already been bought. Is it contemplated under this law that the Government with the power to purchase the lands can go and condemn those pieces of land?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. TUCKER. Then, how are you going to get rid of that trouble?

Mr. ANTHONY. The Government can secure them only by lease or purchase, subject to the approval of the State legislature, but they intend to secure these grounds as refuges and breeding grounds and not primarily for shooting purposes, although shooting would be permitted on certain areas in proper season.

Mr. TUCKER. Then you would not get rid of the trouble that now exists.

Mr. ANTHONY. I see no trouble.

Mr. TUCKER. And the Kansas City club would still keep the gentleman from hunting on that particular lake.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I really feel that I have taken as much time as I should and I will have to reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature of this bill which is very highly important, in my judgment, and one in which I am heartily concerned, and that is the refuge, breeding, and resting grounds for the migratory birds. It is highly important, in my opinion, that these places of refuge be provided; but I am opposed to the Federal license. I can not support a proposition that will require every hunter in the land to take out a license. The annoying, vexing details of getting a license to hunt any sort of a bird would be very objectionable. If this bill can be amended eliminating the license feature, and if you will make a direct appropriation to provide these places of refuge, breeding, and resting grounds, then well enough, I am for it. But unless it is amended I shall have to take a position against the bill. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this bill is in the nature of an anticlimax. During the campaign of two years ago or three years ago we were fed upon promises as rosy as Nebuchadnezzar's hanging gardens. The American people were told that if they would just let the Republicans again take charge of the machinery of the Government everything and everybody would be prosperous. They would simply wave the magic legislative wand and prosperity, clad in the garments of happiness and with a smile on her seraphic face, would appear in all her ribboned loveliness. The dogs would bark prosperity, the breezes would blow prosperity, the birds would sing prosperity, and the bulls would bellow prosperity.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what happened.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In fact, the whole Nation was to be clad in the finest and choicest of apparel, unspeakable all and full of glory. The American people took them at their word. They were placed in charge of both branches of Congress. After waiting about three years the mountains in labor have brought forth a mouse. The great Committee on Agriculture, which, as my friend and colleague [Mr. TUCKER] says, is supposed to look after the interests of the farmer, has reported a bird-pasture bill. We have passed——

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have only 15 minutes, and when I have finished I will yield. We have passed annoying laws here until the American people are crying out in despair, "For heaven's sake, Lucy, give us a rest." The more we pass such laws as this, the more disgusted the people will probably be. Just such laws are driving the American people to despair. Already there are hundreds of thousands of Federal employees and 30,000 detectives, spies, and special agents, who have been regulating and delving into the lives of American citizens. It would seem that would be enough of them, but this bill would add many more of those officers. Here are more officers, more regulations, more supervision, more Federal control, more legislative tomfoolery. What is the purpose of this bill? It is to reach down into the pockets of every man who shoots an occasional duck, gather in the shekels, and thus create an immense fund to provide ample shooting grounds for the professional huntsman. This is a professional huntsman's bill, to provide a means whereby he may follow the birds from place to place and shoot to his heart's content.

If it is desired to establish game preserves where no shooting whatever is allowed, well and good. Such a plan would furnish cities of refuge where the birds could find a haven of refuge from the professional huntsman's deadly aim; and I would be in sympathy with that kind of a provision, and I shall offer an amendment when it comes to that point that will make this a game refuge bill and not a game destroying bill. But that is not what they want.

If on the other hand it is desired to establish public shooting grounds—and I hope the House will listen carefully to what I am going to say in reference to this—if it is desired to provide public shooting grounds, every man and every boy who shoots an occasional duck should not be taxed to establish such grounds, but only those who shoot upon those grounds should be charged so much per day for every day they hunt upon those grounds. That would be fair, and I shall also offer an amendment to that effect. There is a public shooting gallery on Ninth Street where they use a .22 Winchester to shoot at targets.

Every man in the District who shoots a .22-caliber Winchester is not taxed so much per rifle to maintain that shooting gallery, but those who practice in that gallery are taxed so much per shot, enough to maintain the gallery. Likewise, if you are going to have public shooting grounds, why should the average citizen who works for a living in Maryland or Vermont or Texas be taxed $1 for the purpose of establishing a public shooting place in some far-away section that is only accessible to a few local people and to the army of professional huntsmen, who might appropriately be termed "the firing squad," and who are the deadly enemies of the birds? Listen. The enemy of the birds is not the farmer or the business man who shoots occasionally, but the habitué, the gentleman of leisure, who practices until his aim is uncanny, and who when he has thinned out the birds in one section sighs for other worlds to conquer, and consequently hies himself to other and greener fields, there builds his blinds and shoots and shoots away, thus following the seasons in their onward march to the South, and shoots away until the helpless birds are driven frantic with fear. He is the man who is fathering this bill and whose associations have indorsed it.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. For a question; yes.

Mr. COLTON. Do I understand that the State loses its jurisdiction in limiting the amount of birds that may be killed on one of these public grounds?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It does in so far as it conflicts with this bill; every place does that conflicts with this bill. It loses its jurisdiction, and it certainly loses its jurisdiction on the grounds that are established, because they would be strictly under Federal control.

If this bill passes, the farmer, when an occasional flock of ducks lands upon a neighboring farm, will be compelled to saddle old Pete, ride five or six miles to the post office, pay his dollar, secure his license, and when he comes back the ducks will have flown. He will look at the empty pond and then at his puny, useless license, and "cuss" the Government.

That is exactly what will happen.

Do you know that under section 12 of this bill any employee of the Department of Agriculture designated by the Secretary is authorized to arrest a man and haul him before the authorities and cause him great inconvenience? There are 20,000 of these employees; 20,000 who could be licensed and authorized to arrest a man without a warrant, and to haul him before the authorities, no matter where he might be going, for the nonpayment of that little old license fee of $1.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. You will find that same provision in the migratory bird treaty act passed in 1905; the identical words.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, the difference is this: That is simply a season regulation. But here is a regulation that applies to every citizen of the United States, every boy or girl who shoots a rifle or an air-gun at a blackbird, or a humming bird, or any of the hundred varieties of birds that fly over this country. He may be arrested by some official of the Department of Agriculture and hauled before the authorities.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is——

Mr. JONES of Texas. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Those are the facts. If the gentleman will read the bill he will see it. I decline to yield. The gentleman can get time under the 5-minute rule in his own right and say all he wants to in regard to it.

Moreover, this measure will add to the burdens of the already groaning and overburdened taxpayer, who is crying out for relief and not for more burdens. It is just another of those altogether too frequent steps toward an overcentralized National Government. It is time that this Congress learn how to spell economy as well as they know how to spell appropriation. But no we must take just this step and just that step until the people are driven into regarding Uncle Sam much as the birds must consider the professional huntsman, who is continually looking for a chance to go gunning for them.

This bill carries an additional appropriation of $50,000, and if you enforce it at the hands of every man the Lord only knows how many additional employees it would be necessary to put into the field to collect this dollar to build this place where the boy who pays his dollar in some far-away section or the business man who pays his dollar would never see unless he happens to live in the immediate locality in which the shooting place is established.

Now, if the proponents are sincere in their position why do they not eliminate everything but the bird-refuge portion of this bill? Oh, they say they are for the one-gallus man. I have magazine after magazine here, published by the sportsmen, giving pictures of the one-gallus man. But no one-gallus man appeared before the committee, and I will wager that in all the propaganda that has gone out in regard to this bill no Congressman has received a letter from the one-gallus man. No. He is made the goat to establish these places for the professional huntsman.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. If this bill is enacted, the one-gallus man that hunts one hour on his own premises will be required to pay the same tax as the other fellow who hunts on his neighbor's land?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If he steps off his premises, he will have to. If he goes to a neighboring farm once a year, he must procure this license. On the other hand, the rich sportsman who goes from shooting ground to shooting ground all during the season pays no more; he just pays that dollar.

Mr. FIELDS. That is not fair to the one-gallus man?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, no. That is not fair to the one-gallus man, but the other fellow always gets his rights.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Under the terms of this bill the man would have to get a license to hunt even on his own land if he did not happen to live on that land?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. He must live on it as a permanent residence. He can not have two tracts of land of 50 acres each and hunt on both of them. He will be compelled to get a license to hunt on his own lake if it happens to be on an adjoining tract.

This goes as far as any measure that has ever been prepared to take away the rights of citizens and will cause annoyances to a degree beyond expression. [Applause.]

Oh, where are the bounds of this never closing national tendency? Where ends this dream of national regulation? And is there no life and no intelligence that can call a halt? Is there to be no place where the citizen may go and feel free from national interference, or the States escape from its ever encroaching power? Should not there be a city of refuge for the citizen, as well as the bird, where that citizen may say here in this charmed spot my Government will treat me right. There is such a place. There is such a spot. It lies in our dual form of government, the foundation stones of which were quarried by revolutionary patriots from the hills of governmental truth.

Our happiness will be more secure, our future will be more glorious, and our prosperity less transitory if these institutions are maintained with their original luster.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] pointed to me and meant to refer to me, although he did so as "the gentleman from Tennessee," when he spoke of the one Member of Congress who went before the committee and when he stated that that Member of Congress had said in substance he was in favor of the wholesale slaughter and killing by the common people of migratory birds. My remarks before the committee were made rapidly and I left the city before their publication and I had no chance to read the proof and they were not well taken down, but neither before the committee nor on the printed page as it now appears did I say any such thing or anything that can reasonably be distorted into any such meaning.

On the contrary, I told him that the laws of my State prohibited hunting two days, if not three, in the week, I did not recall which, and that it prescribed the hours of the day, from the early morning until 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and that the laws regulating shooting migratory birds in North Carolina were rigid and positive and strong, and that I had stood for seven years beside the sportsmen in the courts of that State as a judicial officer trying to enforce the fair and reasonable protection of the magnificent game supply of its waters. I told him what I tell this committee now, that what the sportsman wants and the way that he proposes to operate this law if he can have it passed is this. I know whereof I speak as to the waters. Here and there in the shallow waters at whose bottom grow the wild celery that the duck and goose feed on there is an island, and that island is occupied by the professional sportsman from the city, who lives in his home on it in ease, sport, and luxury. I have been there and seen his life and know it. He wants the Agricultural Department to avail itself of this bill to lay out a reservation covering an immense area of water that lies out surrounding his island. The proprietary rights which he now enjoys under the law of the State on his island will not be interfered with by this bill. But he is not satisfied with that. He wants the Agricultural Department to protect the far distant waters from which the bird flies to and around his blind. By the shooting in these birds that would probably fly and light down over and around his blind and fall a victim to to-morrow morning's gun will either be killed or frightened away and his morning sport planned for to-morrow will be spoiled by this evening's shooting, though that shooting may be far away. Here is an illustration of how they feel and act in these matters. Down on Currituck Sound in North Carolina there started from the shores of the highlands two years ago late in the afternoon two boys, about 15 and 17 years of age, in a little boat, to go out and find themselves a duck or goose, not intending to invade the proprietary rights or the possession of any clubman, but to go out and shoot where the sound of the gun would drive and frighten away the ducks and the geese. The clubman's guardsman, of whom he keeps several, were surveying the waters with their far-reaching glasses from a tower built for the purpose and saw the boys as they were drifting far away to the distant waters where the clubman did not want any shooting.

They took a fast boat and high-powered rifles and went out in that direction and getting in safe range commenced to bombard the boys until they had killed one of them and left only his companion 15 years old to tell the story. Now, what this sportsman and his fellows want to do is to make his guardsmen Federal marshals. He wants them appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture to stay there as officers, and when a boy goes out meddling with the birds that he hopes to kill next morning they will take him without a warrant and carry him across three counties to a Federal commissioner; and with a crowded Federal court docket the sportsman will drag him to court four or five times and avail himself of the protection of the law by carrying that boy from court to court until his going is worse than his conviction would have been in the first court. I know, Mr. Chairman, that this bill is the last word of the sportsman and that if passed it completes his reign of triumph and of empire. In order to complete his protection and his reign of triumph and of empire he asks this Congress to pass for him a bill under which a boy can be carried by his guardsman across two or three counties to find a Federal commissioner to bind him over to court, and there be tried for the trifling, picayunish charge as provided in this bill of disturbing a fish in these waters. [Applause.] Yes; disturbing a fish, or getting wrongfully, as he may insist, into possession of a single bird egg. If that boy has one single bird egg found in his possession, this bill requires the Federal judge to sit on the bench and issue a judicial decree determining the title to that particular egg. What an imposing, stupendous, and inspiring spectacle to contemplate! A Federal judge sitting with district attorneys around about him while the public look on in amazement and wonder determining the question of the title to a bird egg, between the boy who found it in the waters of a marsh and the Agricultural Department of the United States. God Almighty save the mask! Is not that a big and glorious and great Government service and function to contemplate? That is what you have in this bill in section 13. If a boy disturbs a fish, put him in jail for six months or fine him $500. Look at section 13, gentlemen, and see it for yourselves.

If he is found in possession of one bird egg, see if the judge does not have to take that egg and determine whether he must ship it to Washington or give it back to the boy under this bill. Yet there is no contention made here that game birds are being ruthlessly exterminated, rather is it admitted that they are increasing under the protection that North Carolina and the other States are giving their waters. We have in my district, compared to its size, although it is small, the best hunting waters for the canvas-back duck and the goose and swan that there is on the face of the globe. The birds are protected and the people respect that State protection, but they do not want Federal marshals vested with the fearful powers provided in this bill. [Applause.]

In the name of personal rights vouchsafed to the citizenship of the country by an inheritance which they have cherished as the blessing of God and of a good government; in the name of every principle of States' rights and the blessings of local government, I protest against the multiplication of Federal marshals, of Federal courts, of statutory crimes, and increasing penalties and new jails for their enforcement. We have already too much Federal criminal law. The people are already wearied to exhaustion with being circumscribed in the ordinary conduct of common life, nagged and pricked by Federal officers, and dragged to courts for the things their fathers did without restraint, let, or hindrance. Such laws and policies do not make patriots. How impossible it is, then, to annoy the people of the country and increase their love of the Government only one grain of common sense will answer. Among all those laws of this character I denounce this bill as the crowning infamy of them all. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have heard this same argument that has been used against this bill offered in the legislature of my State and at other places when game-protection bills were being considered. The argument that is used here against the freedom of hunting and all that sort of thing is the argument that has been used against every game law that has ever been passed, I suppose, in the United States. It is either a question of passing some such measure as this or in a little while having no hunting at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I have not the time to yield in four minutes. If you want to preserve the migratory birds you must have some sort of game refuges. My country, out in Illinois along the Mississippi River, was once the best duck-hunting ground in the United States; it is the main highway of the flight of ducks from north to south. Now they go through like an express train. There is nothing there for them to stop to feed on. All the land has been drained out along that country until there runs just the Mississippi River, running straight through the country from the north to the Gulf, and a duck that starts from the north goes on through to the south and never stops any place along the route.

Unless there are bird refuges established at the north end and the south end where the ducks can propagate and rest and build up their race and resting places along the way, there is no future for migratory birds. In my judgment some such methods as this must be adopted. It has been argued here that the man who wants to go out and kill a duck on his neighbor's farm will have to pay a dollar in order to do it. Does he not have to do so now? There are few States in the United States that do not require such a license. I am taking my own State as an example of the fact that if I go outside of my own farm and onto some neighbor's farm to kill a duck I must buy a State license. I am interested in preserving the game of this country for the future. I am interested in hunting. If a man is interested in keeping up the supply of game, if he is interested in hunting, what particular hardship is it to him to pay an additional dollar to the United States if he knows that by that means he is helping to keep up the game and to preserve it?

There is one thing more to which I want to call attention, and that is the migratory insectivorous birds that have not been touched upon in this debate. There is nothing in the world more valuable to the farmer or to the interests of agriculture than the migratory insectivorous birds that go back and forth through the country, flying 2,000 and 2,500 miles from one side of the country to the other. The refuges for those birds are rapidly being cut down and destroyed. In my country where farming is becoming intensive, where there used to be hedge rows and patches of brush on every farmer's land, they are disappearing to-day until these birds in their annual migration across the country have no refuges in which to stop.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am very sorry, but I have declined to yield to anybody because of my limited time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is very essential that we have something of this kind, and I can see no reason on earth for the opposition that has been made to this bill, or for the claim that it takes away from the States some rights which they now have.

The same arguments were made by me on the floor when the original migratory bird bill passed. I joined the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in opposing that bill, thinking at that time that the State had the ownership and entire control of any game within its borders. But I afterwards heard the opinion of the Supreme Court, delivered by Justice Holmes, in which he elucidated the doctrine that the United States had a right as a national policy to preserve the migratory birds that went through the country, on agricultural grounds, if upon no other. I am following that conclusion. If it is correct, and I have no doubt it is, it follows, as a matter of corollary, that we have a right to establish these refuges where they may rest or they will rapidly disappear. If you do not do something of this kind the man or boy who wants to hunt migratory birds will soon have no place to hunt. I would like to have you tell me where a man may hunt to-day without the permission or a license from some one.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Deal.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, some of my colleagues realize the reluctance I have in appearing before the House to discuss any question. But the effect of this legislation, in my opinion, is so far-reaching that I feel it my duty to raise my voice in protest to its being enacted into law. In my district we have a feeding ground which is perhaps one of the best, if not the most valuable, in all the world. The marshes adjacent to these waters have been taken up by men of means, so that there is absolutely no hunting ground that can be had for the people of that district. This body of water is 8 miles wide and about 40 miles in length. The owners of the land, the marshes adjacent thereto, have been seeking for years at the hands of the General Assembly of Virginia to prohibit other persons, the native citizens of Virginia, from hunting even in the waters of that bay, contending that it is not navigable water, and therefore their rights in the marshes extend to the middle of the bay. Wild celery, rice, and spiral grass grow in abundance, and a high class of migratory birds repair to that body of water by the hundreds of thousands and, perhaps, millions to feed. At certain seasons under our State laws our citizens may go out on this body of water and hunt. Now it is the purpose of special interests to prevent the natives from hunting in those waters. I want to give you the names of some of the individuals and clubs who own these hunting grounds:

The American Tobacco Co. You can not buy a share of stock in that club for love or money. Former Senator Penrose and his brother, Doctor Penrose, are interested in a club. Mr. Van Ransellear and John C. O'Connor; William E. Gary is an owner of a private club, and also Mr. George D. Vanbright. The Ragged Island Club is owned by local people, controlled by persons principally in my own city. Sandy Cove was a club of which President Cleveland was a member as long as he lived. These clubs and these lands have been in the possession of these men for years and years. Mr. George Gould owns one of the clubs, and also Mr. Stillman, of New York, Tom Dickson, and others of that type of men.

These men are those who are seeking to override State laws because they have been unable in the State of Virginia to secure legislation that would prevent our citizens from hunting on this body of water. They have even sought to prevent the retrieving of crippled birds with motor boats. They are now seeking, under this bill, to place control of these and other waters under the regulation of the Department of Agriculture, feeling that they may then succeed in doing that which they have failed to do all these years through the State legislature.

Under the provisions of this bill I could not, on land owned or leased, hunt until I had secured a Federal license. I could not, in company with my neighbor, enter upon and hunt wherein I would go upon his lands or he upon my lands until we had secured a Federal license. This, it seems to me, is the grossest kind of an invasion of the rights of American citizens. I do not object to those who own lands for hunting purposes on the marshes of Back Bay enjoying the exclusive use of those lands, but I do object to a law that is evidently being enacted in the interest and at the instance of these people that will require me to secure a Federal license to hunt on my own lands.

But after all this is not my real objection to the bill. I contend that it is an invasion of the rights of the States and the people by the Federal Government. I know that some of my lawyer colleagues will say that if I were a lawyer and knew the law I would know that this measure has been made constitutional by a decision of the Supreme Court declaring this law within the rights of the Federal Government on the ground that migratory birds would come under the head of interstate commerce and therefore under the control of Congress. It may be contended further than the Constitution gives the President of the United States the right, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties with foreign countries. That having made a treaty the Federal Government would be in honor bound required to enact legislation for the enforcement of the treaty rights. If we will refer to the treaty, however, we will find that article 8 provides "the high contracting powers agree themselves to take, or propose to their respective appropriate lawmaking bodies, the necessary measures for insuring the execution of the present convention. What are the appropriate lawmaking bodies, if not the legislatures of the States of the Union, to whom these powers lawfully belong? I do not understand that there has been any amendment to the Constitution granting such powers to the Federal Government. Not being a lawyer, when I read the Constitution, which is written in extremely simple and plain language, I find nowhere in that solemn contract between the States, representing the people as parties of the first part and the Federal Government as party of the second part, has there been delegated to the Federal Government the right to control the question of hunting and the acquiring of food by citizens within the State. Then I find that the States are not denied the right to control these privileges, and, therefore, under the tenth amendment these rights are reserved to the people themselves.

If Congress insists upon overriding the plain mandates of the Constitution and assuming powers which have not been delegated to it, we will soon find that those liberties, of which we have boasted for all these years, will be a thing of the past, and the peaceful revolution must inevitably lead to a bloody revolution. For not in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race do we find that the masses of the people have ever submitted to the arbitrary control of rights which should be enjoyed by the people free of interference from a tyrannical and autocratic government. The police powers of a State, excepting where otherwise provided by modern amendments to the Constitution, are still under the law exclusively within the control of the States. But what does this bill propose? In the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture testimony was given to the effect that there are 1,000,000 persons in this country who would pay a license tax of $1 to hunt. This would mean a revenue of $1,000,000 per year, 45 per cent, or $450,000, of which is to be used for the purchase of game refuges. I do not know as to the value of lands in the Middle and Western States, but I do know that the lands and marshes that are frequented by the high-class migratory birds, which feed upon vegetable matter exclusively, can not be purchased in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia except at a very high price, even though they can be found at all. I would say that these lands are worth $200 per acre.

Therefore, within our belt, assuming that the $450,000 could be spent in any one section of the country, and that section should be in the States named, the $450,000 would purchase 2,250 acres of lands. Ten per cent of the remainder would probably be used for administrative purposes, leaving 45 per cent, or $450,000, for the employment of wardens to patrol these lands and prevent poachers thereon during the hunting season. Assuming that $500 would be required for each warden for patrolling such refuges, say for three months during the year, the $450,000 would employ 900 men as special police, agents, detectives, or spies to dog and bedevil the footsteps of American citizens, and this annual increase would soon result in an army of untold proportions. It has been said that 25 years ago there were less than 200 detectives and spies in the employ of the Federal Government. To-day there are perhaps 30,000, and if we continue to enact laws that trespass upon the rights of the people, laws to which the people are opposed and unwilling to obey, we will be swamped with an enormous army to destroy the peace, happiness, and the comfort of the American people.

We find also a provision in this bill that no person shall take, hunt, pursue, shoot, capture, trap, snare, kill, disturb, or attempt to take, hunt, pursue, shoot, capture, trap, snare, kill, or disturb any fish, wild animal, or wild bird, or collect, destroy, or disturb any nest or egg of any such bird on any land, water, or land and water of the United States which has been or may hereafter be set apart as a public shooting ground or bird or game refuge under this act.

Assuming for the sake of argument that the Federal Government has the right under the decision of the Supreme Court to control the hunting with respect to migratory birds, we fail to understand how any gentleman having subscribed to an oath that he will support, maintain, and uphold the Constitution of the United States can knowingly undertake control as to fish that swim in the waters, or animals and birds that live exclusively within the State, and this is what the bill in question proposes to do upon such refuges. Of what value can these things be unless they are to be enjoyed by the people as a whole? But it would be better far that every migratory bird and all the beasts that roam the forest should be destroyed absolutely and this source of food eliminated from public use than that the liberty of the American people should be subjected to the autocratic control of a bureaucratic Government.

[Mr. DEAL had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois and Mr. JONES of Texas had leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand this bill to be what some of its opponents charge it means. I am a State-rights Democrat. I have stood for that principle in government and for the principle of local control wherever possible. The United States and Canada entered into a treaty agreement for the protection of migratory birds. This bill does not extend the jurisdiction of the United States over these birds where the law does not cover them now. In shooting migratory birds there is no extension of Federal authority under this bill. I can not understand the opposition, for in my opinion the bill simply does this. A man who shoots a migratory bird must derive some pleasure or some satisfaction out of the sport and he is to be charged $1 for that privilege, and that dollar is to be used in setting aside certain spaces of land, certain asylums, if you please, for the safety of these birds that pass from north to south.

Mr. ELLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWES. I can not yield. Gentlemen have referred to the game preserves used by rich men as depriving the poor man of his old-time privilege of shooting.

Nobody suffers more from this than I do, but this law has no effect upon these preserves. One gentleman talked about these preserves and the protection of the game and of a man being brought before a Federal judge to be examined upon the question of shooting a bird. My understanding is that that refers only to the land set off and designated as an inclosure for the preservation of migratory birds.

I am getting to be an older man; I have had my fun in shooting. I think this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have tried to make it plain that my opposition to this legislation is because it is an extraordinary extension of Federal police power without any sound reason or excuse for such extension. It is the greatest extension of Federal police power proposed since the beginning of our Government, save that under the Volstead Act. That extension was made after the people had declared in favor of such legislation by the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which clearly authorized it in the hope of bringing about a great moral reform. This proposed extension of police power is excused under a divided decision of the Supreme Court under the claim or in the hope of increasing the number of the peedees, the coots, the flickers, the cranes, and gulls throughout the land. That is, let us assume, a worthy purpose, but it is not necessary to reduce the States of the Union to the condition of provinces or compel citizens to go before Federal courts to answer accusations of a trifling nature in order to preserve the bird life in America, and if it were necessary, the right of the citizen in his community, the right of the States under the Constitution, the liberties of the people, free from the surveillance and espionage of Federal agents, in connection with acts and practices no more harmful than the possible destruction of a bird nest or the killing of the most unimportant feathered creature, is infinitely more important than even the increase of the number of migratory birds. [Applause.]

Under this bill everyone who proposed or intended to use or discharge a shotgun must secure a Federal gun license, for who would dare venture afield hunting for any bird when reminded that, according to the treaty, the following are specifically named as migratory birds, to wit:

The high contracting powers declare that the migratory birds included in the terms of this convention shall be as follows:

1. Migratory game birds:

(a) Anatidae or waterfowl, including brant, wild ducks, geese, and swans.

(b) Gruidae or cranes, including little brown, sandhill, and whooping cranes.

(c) Rallidae or rails, including coots, gallinules, and sora and other rails.

(d) Limicolae or shorebirds, including avocets, curlew, dowitchers, godwits, knots, oyster catchers, phalaropes, plovers, sandpipers, snipe, stilts, surf birds, turnstones, willet, woodcock, and yellowlegs.

(e) Columbidae or pigeons, including doves and wild pigeons.

2. Migratory insectivorous birds: Bobolinks, catbirds, chickadees, cuckoos, flickers, flycatchers, grosbeaks, humming birds, kinglets, martins, meadow larks, nighthawks or bull bats, nuthatches, orioles, robins, shrikes, swallows, swifts, tanagers, titmice, thrushes, vireos, warblers, waxwings, whippoorwills, woodpeckers, and wrens, and all other perching birds which feed entirely or chiefly on insects.

3. Other migratory nongame birds: Auks, auklets, bitterns, fulmars, gannets, grebes, guillemots, gulls, herons, jaegers, loons, murres, petrels, puffins, shearwaters, and terns.

Under this bill not only must a Federal license be taken out but, with or without a license, any citizen becomes liable to prosecution by Federal courts for any hunting or taking of not only these birds but fish as well, contrary to any rule or regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. Not content to centralize authority over fishing and hunting, the framers of this legislation carry to the limit the principle of "government by departmental regulations," and we are expected to accept all this after one hour of debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, one would gather from the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that this is some new idea that has sprung full blown from the brain of some worshiper of centralized government. Instead of that it is the natural result of action already taken in the States. This is no new idea to cause such horror as is here expressed; it comes from the States that have best fulfilled their obligations as States. I hold it fundamental that the State has the right to deal with questions wholly State in character, and the Nation has the same authority with reference to national questions.

The State of Pennsylvania is the originator of this idea of game sanctuaries and public shooting grounds. In 1906 that State established the first one in this country, and it was due to exactly the situation pointed out by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL]. Rich men were buying certain tracts of land and reserving them for their exclusive hunting. The result of it was that a man without entrée could not have the opportunity of hunting game. Then the State undertook to establish preserves. We have in Pennsylvania 32 of these sanctuaries, established at a cost of some millions of dollars. In 1921 we spent in Pennsylvania $665,351.91 for dealing with the game of the State as a plan for Pennsylvania welfare. We have there a system which has gone very far in beneficial results. In 1906 the deer were almost extinct, and at that time there were men who protested against any restrictions upon hunting the few which were left.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I can not yield.

That was the situation in 1906, but in 1922 there were 6,000 bucks shot by hunters in Pennsylvania, having a value for venison alone of $480,000—6 per cent on a capital of $8,000,000, which is the value of deer in Pennsylvania to-day. That has been brought about by the establishment of refuges and protection of game.

Mr. MONDELL. The State of Pennsylvania has done so very well in animal and bird preservation, why not leave the matter with the State?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is exactly what I am saying. Pennsylvania has done everything a State can do, and now she wants the Federal Government to do what can only be done by national authority. She wants assistance from the National Government in dealing with migratory birds, which regularly cross State lines, and which can not be handled as are deer and bears and other game in Pennsylvania.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I want to finish my statement and say that Pennsylvania has shown what can be done by the use of game refuges and sanctuaries. In one place 50 miles from Pittsburgh, where there was little game known some 20 years ago, last year 5,000 hunters, including many workers from the mills and mines of the Pittsburgh district, used the public shooting grounds and killed some 60 buck deer besides a great many other game animals. More than 450,000 persons take out hunting licenses each year in the Keystone State. The State has done its part, and it comes to the Government and says, "Do your part." It is not a question of extending national authority; it is a question of the Nation dealing with the question that is beyond State power.

There is one other point in this bill to which I would direct attention. Of course, the postmaster is the proper official to handle these licenses, as he is the agent of the United States, but there is no provision in the bill for any compensation for the additional work involved.

There should be an amendment to provide that at least 10 per cent of the moneys collected by the postmaster shall go to the postmaster for compensation.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I refuse to yield. The fourth-class postmasters will be doing a great deal of this work. They are now getting such meager compensation as to almost make it impossible to hold the postmasters of that class. There should be a provision giving the postmaster 10 per cent at least of the amount paid in for licenses, and a further provision that that much be taken out of the money covered into the General Treasury. With that addition this bill will aid in the conservation of wild life, in the conservation of wealth, which, with proper care, means a continuous possession, and it will not be any undue interference with the rights of the States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time is exhausted, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will change it to a parliamentary inquiry. Will the bill as originally drafted be read and all the substitution considered as one amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has before it the bill H. R. 5823, and will consider it by sections. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of the "Federal public shooting ground and bird refuge act."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "public shooting ground and."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, practically every man who has spoken in behalf of this bill has confined himself almost exclusively to the proposition of providing a bird sanctuary where birds will be protected. I have offered an amendment to make it purely a bird-sanctuary bill. I have offered to strike out "public shooting ground and" in this section, and have prepared amendments throughout the bill which will strike out the words "public shooting grounds" and leave it purely a bird-refuge bill. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the proposition to protect the birds, but if you establish public shooting grounds beside these bird sanctuaries, where the professional huntsmen may swarm and shoot them after they have been brought into the sanctuary, you will get nowhere. I would not object to the paying of a dollar—although I would not like to have it go in the form of a license by the Federal Government—I would not object to paying a dollar to form bird refuges, but I do object to paying a dollar and having every schoolboy in my district pay a dollar to secure a public shooting ground in some faraway section that is only accessible to few of the local people and a great horde of professional hunts-men. I do not believe that policy should be adopted. If you people are sincere in wanting a bird refuge place, make it a bird refuge bill. You can make it so by striking out the words as provided in the amendment.

It would be a shame to make the ragged urchin, who in barefooted fashion trudges the hills, pay $1 for public shooting grounds he could never hope to see.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This amendment shows the true colors of the opposition to this bill. Abolish the public shooting-ground feature of the bill and you leave it so that only those who are financially able to own game preserves will have the privilege of hunting migratory birds because sooner or later, unless there is a sanctuary and public shooting ground, there will be no hunting for the ordinary fellow.

Mr. SISSON. There will be none with the shooting grounds.

Mr. TINCHER. Some one says there will be none with the shooting grounds. Do you believe the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] who just spoke in reference to this? Have you had occasion to examine the hearings where men testified who were versed in this matter and who have studied it for years? Have public shooting grounds done any good in the State of Pennsylvania to afford the common, every-day fellow the privilege of hunting? I left the room a moment ago when a Member of Congress who testified before the committee rather denied a portion of my statement this morning. Gentleman, I have no way of knowing what any game warden stands for or any Member of Congress stands for on this subject except what they say and who appeared before our committee. Turn to page 49 of the hearings and he said that his constituents under the game laws might go out and shoot a duck and stand before the grocery store where they had plenty of things, sugar and groceries and supplies, but that he could not under these obnoxious laws trade his ducks for other products, and I take it from that that he wanted commercialism in this industry. Then the next day a game commissioner from the State of Virginia, a gentleman who had every appearance of being a high-class man, appeared before us—you will find this on page 56, a man by the name of M. D. Hart—said that he represented the "one-gallus" man, and that is where the term originated in our hearing, and he was asking for this legislation so that a man might have a way to hunt.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether that game warden was better informed than the Congressman from North Carolina was. I do know he gave us figures in the hearings showing how much it cost a man to shoot a duck down there. I say to you if you adopt this amendment to cut out public shooting grounds, it would be the entering wedge of the opposition to this bill, which, by the way, is the most remarkable opposition that I have yet encountered in this House—the, I will not say unholy, alliance between the gentleman from Tennessee and my good friend from Wyoming—the leadership. I wonder what is behind it? What does it mean? I know they both love the Constitution. I do not question that; but I know, Mr. Chairman, that in nearly every high-class, high-priced hotel in this country to-day you can buy wild duck for food, and those selling ducks are guilty of violating the law.

Mr. BLANTON. And you can find lame ducks.

Mr. TINCHER. I know in Wyoming they have one of the greatest national game preserves in the world, and people who live there have many privileges; and I have heard of a great lake in this country, and I have been told surrounding the lake there are many cottages occupied by fishermen and hunters of wild duck.

I do not know who sells those ducks that you can buy at the hotels in Washington, but I do know the one-gallus fellow is not doing it. They are killed from the big preserves, and the Federal Government has the right—I am willing to meet that issue—the Federal Government has an absolute right and it is the duty of Congress to legislate on the subject of migratory birds regardless of any unholy alliance that may be entered into here. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and to enlighten my good friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] as to the source of my opposition.

I have not forgotten and I shall never forget the time when, as a small boy, I traded 24 muskrat skins for a single-barreled muzzle-loading shotgun and made out of an old horn a powder flask and out of an old piece of rawhide a shot pouch.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not yield. And went forth to hunt migratory birds. I did not get many. They would have had to be very tame and gentle to have enabled me to get many of them with that sort of artillery, but I got some. Occasionally I brought home a duck, and, thank the Lord, I was not called upon to go to the post office 10 miles away and take out a Federal license and submit myself, as you now propose, not to the laws on the statute books, but to the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, changed from day to day and from week to week, under which, had I happened to kill one bird ever so small and ever so insignificant contrary to the regulations or happened to have stepped upon the nest of one bird unintentionally, I could have been called before a Federal judge hundreds of miles away to answer for my awful crime. I remember those days, and I think of the boys of to-day similarly situated.

I have had no protest reach me from any soul on earth against this bill, with the possible exception of one letter dimly recalled; I have had many appeals, by letter and by personal visits, to vote for it. Ah, that is the trouble these days. We are legislating, or we are urged to legislate, at the behest of active minorities who know what they want and know how to get it. [Applause.]

Out home yonder are the common folks, inarticulate in a case like this, because they believe in us and believe that we will remember them. Uninformed as to what is happening here, they look to us to have in mind their interests and their viewpoint. [Applause.] I do not say that the game wardens who have appealed to us in behalf of this measure have, all of them, been actuated by the hope of splendid Federal positions.

I know that some of them have been promised such positions or have been led to believe they would secure them. [Applause.] I do not say that no one except millionaire hunters with their expensive plants and their great preserves are for this legislation. I know that they are for it; all of them. I impugn no man's motives. I think gentlemen may well refrain from impugning the motives of those of us who, without any urging or pressure against this bill from home or elsewhere and in the face of urgent requests to support it oppose this legislation, because we still remember that this is a Republic of States, a National Government of limited powers, and that not yet, thank God, are the States provinces or their people subjects. [Applause.] The easy and seemingly popular thing is to support this bill, the organizations favorable to it have for the time being quieted opposition. Even the cat and buffalo fishermen have, I am told, been assured their business will be protected by a special amendment. And so, for the time being, it seems to be popular with all except those who remember that even so worthy a cause as that of the establishment of public hunting preserves does not justify the radical departure from fundamental American policies which this bill contemplates.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in his impassioned appeal, I thought back 30 or 40 years ago, of the time when I was a boy in Illinois. There, on a little farm that my father owned and where I was raised, in the meadows I could hear in the summer time the golden plovers whistling. There, in the morning, I could hear the drum of the prairie chicken. There, on the creek and streams, were ducks and wild fowl everywhere. And I took my old muzzle-loading gun, which would shoot harder backward that it would frontward, and went out hunting with the other boys. All over the countryside, here and there, we went, and came home with game, which was in profusion in those days. Nobody said, "You can not come here," or "You can not go there"; and we learned to shoot and to carry our guns and to aim straight; all over the country the boys were doing that and learning how to shoot straight, and learning things that did service to this country in time of war, when we were pitted against our enemies.

The years have passed on, and now your boy and my boy are growing up, and what do they find? The prairies have no game, as they had in those days. To-day the duck flies high and flies past and away beyond them. To-day, as the boy goes on the next farm, he sees a sign, "No hunting here." He goes down to the creek, and there is a man who stops his approach to that, and there is no place where the boy can shoot and follow the wild game, as was the case when I was a boy. And when he goes down the Mississippi or along the Potomac, he finds rich men's clubs, where he can not go, every foot preempted, and unless he has money to spend he gets nowhere. What is the boy of to-day going to do?

I tell you, my friends, the long and short of it is I would like to do something that will bring about a situation where the boys of the future will have the same privileges and the same chance to hunt wild game which I as a boy had. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, one of the most notable things about the discussions in this House is the number of ingenious arguments that can be advanced to justify any increase in the number of Federal establishments. I notice that the most ingenious argument indulged in is that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

I followed him as best I could in his poetical flight, but the gist of his argument on that point seemed to be that he wanted the boys of this generation enjoy some of the wild life that he enjoyed in his day. [Laughter.] Well, I thought this was a game preserve bill, a migratory bird law. Of course, unless you follow the strict rules of grammatical construction, the bill might be interpreted as a bill providing for the open shooting of the general public. Some gentleman suggests that the title ought to be changed, because it really now contemplates that the public will get shot and provides Federal licenses for shooting the public. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, seriously I want to call attention to this. Instead of insinuating that there is something awful, as the gentleman from Kansas did, back of the fact that the two party leaders on this floor agreed in their opposition to this bill, it ought to cause the gentleman to express his gratification that the leaders of the two parties upon this floor, and especially the leader of the majority party, have the courage to resist what we know is the propaganda that is putting this bill over, and not the judgment of the House. Oh, let us try to stem the tide of propaganda and if possible try to stop the onward march of the absolute doing away with the States and the piling of everything onto the Federal Government. Why, gentlemen, there are some people in this country—charming, delightful people, who make nice social companions in the parlor—who, if they had their way about it, would compel you to take out a Federal license to kiss your own wife, and they would do it under the public-welfare clause. I can appreciate that there might be some situations where that would be in the interest of the public health. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen talk about the one-gallus fellow, like the gentleman from Kansas. I do not mean he is a one-gallus fellow; I mean he talks about the one-gallus fellow. Why, gentlemen, if you think that you can put this bill over by making a plea to have the Federal Government set up public shooting grounds for the poor boys of the country, you are certainly reduced to dire straits. Do you suppose that these game preserves and game sanctuaries are going to be of any practical benefit to the general public? And if they were, do you think that is the function of the Federal Government to engage in that kind of business? If it is, possibly it would be better for the preservation of the wild youth of the country if the Federal Government should require a Federal license for a public dance hall, so as to see that it is run properly. Once you start upon this road of loading everything upon the Federal Government, you can find plenty of arguments to justify you in doing anything that an insistent propaganda demands you do.

Is it the public welfare that brings this pressure here? Oh, if we follow the lines of least resistance, if we listen to the importunities of the fair ones and the gallant ones and the good sportsmen, of course we will pass the bill. I know one very dear friend of mine—I should hate to see this bill pass, because I think it would ruin him. He is a pretty good citizen now, making pretty good money, but I feel absolutely certain that he will get a Federal appointment under this law. Public office! Controlling your neighbors' affairs, controlling everything from Washington, Federal agents! Why, gentlemen, pretty soon you are going to have Federal agents regulating everything, and you had better catch the spirit that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] have caught. The people of this country, that great inarticulate mass to which the gentleman from Wyoming refers, are getting exasperated with the horde of officeholders. The Federal agents that are running up and down this land interfering with every activity of the honest, everyday citizen are building up distrust, exasperation, and resentment against the Federal Government where there ought to exist a feeling of patriotic obedience and respect. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask recognition?

Mr. TREADWAY. I asked recognition and I was recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the motion?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is clearly in order at any time.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is an amendment pending. I suggest that the other amendment be disposed of first.

Mr. TREADWAY. The rule provides that the motion to strike out the enacting clause takes precedence over any amendment.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts ask to speak on his amendment?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the question of whether or not my motion is in order. It is absolutely and plainly in order under clause 7 of Rule XXIII, section 853, of the manual. There is no question about the motion being in order.

The debate has run on here for some two hours or more, evidently with very marked opposition to this bill, and righteously so. [Applause.] I think it is a very poor bill, and I wish my colleagues on the Republican side were as cordial in their indorsement of that statement as my Democratic friends are; but this is not a political matter, gentlemen. It is purely a question whether or not we are going to get down to brass tacks on the question of controlling everything in sight from a Federal Government center. I am opposed to that principle. [Applause.] I am going to vote against this bill whether my motion to strike out the enacting clause carries or not.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] and other gentlemen have referred to the one-gallus man that they want to protect. I have a section of my district where the boys do not wear any galluses and I do not know as they even wear belts, but they do like once in a while to get out and hunt.

Mr. MERRITT. Do they wear pants?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; or overalls; they have that much protection, surely, and perhaps blue shirts. But they do want once in a while to have a chance to go out and go through our woods and hillsides without a Federal agent pursuing them. It is bad enough to have a State agent on their necks, but we will stand for that. Why the boy in the hills of western Massachusetts should have the trembling fear that there is an agent from Washington with a big badge on coming up to arrest him and hale him down to Boston before the Federal court because, forsooth, he wants to spend an afternoon holiday in the woods I fail to see. Further than that, I see a clause in here that is mighty clever—that is, on the part of the advocates of this bill. This first section here that is about to be read, if my motion does not prevail, provides that the boy is not required to have that license if he hunts on his dad's own lot. That is mighty kind. Why did not you cover him in that?

Why do you let him have that chance? Why give him a show in his dad's back dooryard? This idea that gentlemen have brought up here of propaganda is most interesting and correct. We are overrun with organizations that want to help raise the morale and the standing of our States and our communities. They are all right, but they miss the human instinct that they ought to have for the boy back home. So I say the whole thing, to my mind, is absurd. I supposed when we recommended the postmasters to be appointed in our respective districts—and heaven knows that is a mean enough job, and I sympathize with the Democratic gentlemen who had that burden for eight years and which we are now going through—in place of those that you had appointed we supposed they were going to lick postage stamps and cancel them, but not to go after boys who had failed to get a license from the postmasters to hunt. I do not want to appoint a postmaster to license a country boy, and if the boy has not got the license to go out after him and arrest him. That is no part of the job of a postmaster or the Department of Agriculture. We are able to regulate those things at home within the boundaries of our State and counties. If we have no better work to do than to pass bills of this type between now and the 4th of March, let us recess until noon of March 4. [Applause.]

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Maryland opposed to the bill?

Mr. HILL. No; I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the question with which the committee is confronted now is not a question of whether we want this law as it is written, but the question before the committee is whether we are going to consider this proposition at all. Only one section has been read. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to strike out the enacting clause which kills the bill without giving an opportunity to amend or perfect it and pass such a law as a majority of the House would favor. I think we ought to vote down the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Then we should proceed in an orderly consideration of the measure. Regardless of whether gentlemen agree as to whether the measure should be passed, it is clear to everyone that there is a great sentiment in this country for this great conservation measure. Whether it is properly drawn, whether it should be amended, are questions which the Committee of the Whole may consider as various amendments are offered. It may be that a gentleman would not favor the bill in its present form, but if certain provisions were stricken out he might favor it. The gentleman from Massachusetts spoke of some provision which he said should not be in the bill. It may be that he is right about that, and if this motion can be voted down the gentleman from Massachusetts can be given an opportunity to amend the bill and make it read as he thinks it ought to read, if the majority is in favor of it. I think there is a great sentiment in the country in favor of it. The gentleman from Wyoming says he has received many letters in favor of it and none against it. I think many Members may say the same thing, but that does not necessarily establish the fact that there is an improper propaganda in favor of the measure. It points to the fact that the American people are trying to let the Representatives in Congress know their views, and the Constitution of the United States gives that right to the American people as one of their sacred rights which comes to the citizens of a popular government. And the fact that there are no unfavorable letters coming in shows there is no real opposition to it in the country. So I say that we should promptly vote down the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, if this were a bill for the protection of game, I should vote for it cheerfully. If it were to set aside sanctuaries or refuges for these birds, I would vote for it; but these are mere incidents of the bill. This bill carries a provision to establish what it calls "public shooting grounds." That is done upon the argument—no, upon the asseveration—that poor people may have the benefit of hunting upon such grounds. Wherever such public grounds are resorted to by migratory birds, such as ducks, geese, and swans, the locations are very isolated and immune. The populations around them are very sparse, otherwise the birds would not frequent such haunts. The number of people contiguous to such grounds, to repeat, are insignificant. Therefore, you can not escape the fact that the only people who will hunt on such grounds are people that come from a distance, and the only people who can come from a distance are the people who are able to pay the high transportation charges to these grounds. Therefore your bill eliminates the poor people of America from any contact with these grounds and only the few well-to-do or rich can enjoy them. I will vote for no such special privileges. Neither will I vote for a Federal license to hunt, nor for the provisions punishing the violations of this law in the Federal courts.

If it is desired to preserve game, to provide for them a sanctuary or a refuge, cut out the public shooting grounds and cut out the officeholders that it is proposed to multiply in this country. [Applause.] Strip the bill of these two objectionable features, and I do not know but that I will be able to vote for it, but I can not vote for a bill that undertakes to stretch so far the powers of the Government to the suppression and extinction of the police powers of the States far and beyond any authority given by the "migratory bird treaty" and the former statute enacted to give it effect.

Mr. PURNELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is rather unusual, and I recognize it is subject to debate, but has not debate been exhausted upon that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the enacting clause has the same status as a motion to amend. Debate upon it is under the five-minute rule. Debate is limited to five minutes on a side, if the point is insisted upon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we ought to have a vote.

Mr. ASWELL. I insist upon it.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard in support of the motion for a few minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. That rule does not militate against the motion of my colleague [Mr. PURNELL] to strike out the last word of the amendment. That is an amendment to the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. There are pending a motion to strike out the enacting clause and also a motion to amend. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] would be in order to move to amend and would be entitled to recognition upon that motion to amend; otherwise debate has been exhausted upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A motion to strike out the enacting clause is a preferential motion, and when it is made must be acted upon. It comes prior to any action on a motion to amend, and any motion to amend is a pro forma motion entirely and is not in order. Discussion of the motion to strike out the enacting clause has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has correctly stated the situation. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is a preferential motion. Ten minutes of debate has been had, and debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, is it not in order to move to strike out the last word of the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. No such motion is possible under the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry. Of course, the statement of the Chair is entirely accurate. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the regular order does not interfere with a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Chair has stated that the motion to strike out the enacting clause has preference. That is true. There are two proposed amendments pending. The vote on the amendment does not affect the question of debate at all. It is just like any other perfecting amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely in error. If the House votes down the motion to strike out the enacting clause, then the motion to strike out the last two words is in order, but until that motion is voted down there is nothing before the committee except to vote on the preferential motion. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so stated. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TREADWAY) there were—ayes 68, noes 56.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. TREADWAY and Mr. HAUGEN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 60.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee d now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAMTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5823 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANTHONY) there were—ayes 97, noes 49.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and object to the vote upon that ground.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 135, answered "present" 1, not voting 136, as follows:

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was adopted.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. Taylor of Arkansas (for) with Mr. Cole of Ohio (against).

Mr. Rainey of Alabama (for) with Mr. Cullen (against).

Mr. McClintic (for) with Mr. Stephens (against).

Mr. Park of Georgia (for) with Mr. Greene of Massachusetts (against).

Mr. Rogers with Mr. Linthicum.

Mr. Strong of Pennsylvania with Mr. Parks of Arkansas.

Mr. Kiess with Mr. Griffin.

Mr. Luce with Mr. Kitchin.

Mr. Connally of Pennsylvania with Mr. Thomas.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. STAFFORD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out was laid on the table.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, many of my friends in Maryland, sincere sportsmen, have written to me in favor of this bill, the title to which is "An act to provide for establishing shooting grounds for the public, for establishing game refuges and breeding grounds, for protecting migratory birds, and requiring a Federal license to hunt them."

I should like to vote for this bill because of their interest in it, but with very great regret after listening to the argument on constitutional grounds of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and following carefully the debate I have come to the conclusion that a canvas-back duck by the mere act of flying across the Maryland line can not by so doing engage in interstate commerce of a kind which, under the Constitution, gives the United States the right to further invade the police power of the State by the enactment of any such legislation as that contained in this bill.

I am entirely in favor of all those provisions of the bill relating to game refuges, public shooting grounds, and so forth, but I am absolutely against the provisions of the House bill which we are considering and which differs somewhat from the Senate bill, that no person shall at any time hunt or attempt to hunt any migratory bird without first obtaining a Federal license through the Post Office Department from one of the postmasters of the United States.

Consistently in this House I have fought for the proper balance of police powers to the States and the Nation. I have consistently fought against the creation of any more Federal crimes with the necessary attendant hordes of Federal agents and inspectors for enforcement.

Section 12 of the bill we are considering provides that any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall have power without warrant to arrest any person committing a violation of this act or any regulations made pursuant to this act in his presence or view, and to take such person immediately for examination or trial before an officer or court of competent jurisdiction.

This confers the power of arrest without a warrant, and I am against such power except in the gravest cases of serious misdemeanors or felonies.

The act then further provides that any employee of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority with a search warrant to search any place. I can not vote for any law which will permit the residence of the humblest citizen to be searched because a small boy has shot a blackbird that came from a neighboring State. I shall not vote for any legislation which permits the application of penalties of as much as $500 fine or six months' imprisonment because, perhaps within the law of his own State, some citizen has shot a wild duck on the waters near his farm.

I am for proper protection of migratory birds; I am for fair sportsmanship. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has said that last year in Minnesota alone $2,000,000 worth of wild fowl were killed. I am impressed by all the arguments, but I consider this a further invasion of the constitutional police powers of the State. For that reason I voted against the rule permitting consideration of this bill, and shall vote against the bill.

Mr. MONDELL, Mr. ELLIS, Mr. VOIGT, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, and Mr. TREADWAY were granted leave to extend their remarks on this bill.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I endeavored to obtain recognition to oppose the motion that the House concur in striking out the enacting clause of this bill. We are all agreed that the United States and the States should prevent the extermination of wild geese, wild swan, brant, wild ducks, and other migratory birds.

The wild pigeon has been exterminated and the rest will follow unless they be given refuges, breeding grounds, and protection in their migration, with strict regulations as to shooting.

We are all agreed in favoring the purpose of this bill, the objections made to that bill could easily be removed by amendment.

If it is asking too much to require a Federal license everywhere at the cost of $1 to anyone who shoots these migratory birds, this provision may be readily amended so that such a license shall not be required except for hunting within the United States shooting grounds, where everybody would agree that a license should be had. If it be feared that large sums may be spent in acquiring public shooting grounds for the delectation of those only who can afford to go there, let us limit or even cut out such purchases, and only buy game refuges. It will be sufficient if we declare the navigable waters of the United States to be avenues of migration and public shooting grounds and subject to United States regulation.

These waters belong to the several States, but are subject to the control of the United States for the purposes of commerce with foreign nations and among the States. (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, par. 3.) If the bird migrations which are as regular as the seasons, are, like the airplane or radio, commerce between the several States and with foreign countries, the United States has full power to regulate such commerce and its ways over these waters. There is much to be said in favor of the view that the migration of ducks, swan, and geese from Canada to the United States and from one State to another is within United States control as a valuable part of interstate and foreign commerce; and if so, the public navigable waters are the main avenues of such commerce and are already entirely within the regulatory power of the United States for that purpose.

If, on the other hand, any further title has to be acquired, these navigable waters do not have to be condemned as private property, but may be used under license to the United States by the legislatures of the various States which ought to be made without cost on proper terms. The States can and will cooperate in their own interest.

This control would be a nearly complete control of the migration so far as ducks, geese, swan, and other water fowl are concerned. On the eastern and western coasts they fly from bay to bay, along the Atlantic and Pacific inlets. In the middle United States they go down the Mississippi, the Alabama, and other great rivers with their branches. Just here the ducks stop to feed in the streams and inlets of the Chesapeake, where they are shot by gun clubs who place decoys in and shoot them over the water, and if the United States can protect them in their migrations, so far as these waters are concerned, there will be no further trouble.

Public shooting will be allowed on proper days, weeks, or months. Licenses and regulations would, of course, be necessary, but the shooting would be largely by the public under proper regulation instead of being the monopoly of shooting clubs on the shore.

There ought to be a large revenue from these licenses, and if part of that revenue is applied to the purchase of refuges in the South for nesting and breeding, where no shooting is ever to be allowed, the purpose of the bill would thus be accomplished, and we shall protect this commerce of the air against interference, and the birds of America against destruction.

The gentleman from Kansas, in charge of this bill, has told us that $2,000,000 worth of water fowl were shot in Minnesota alone in one year.

During the past two months great flocks of wild ducks have found a refuge on the Potomac near to Potomac Park, and I have seen them every day as I went around the park. Most of them have now gone South, but I saw 18 this morning in the inner river, next to the wharves, making their home there in spite of steamers, sailing vessels, and the travel on the shore and bridges. A wild duck is the shyest of birds, and yet these shy creatures have found out that they were not shot from this side of the river and come here for refuge.

It seems as if there were in this fact a mute appeal to Congress to make all the navigable waters of the United States as free and safe to these innocent creatures as are the waters next to this great city.

I close as I began. I am sorry that the enacting clause was struck out of this bill. It should have been amended.

A license should perhaps be required only on United States shooting grounds. The navigable waters of the United States to high-water mark can and should by one sentence be made part of such avenues of migration and grounds. Refuges should also be acquired, all to be under one United States control.

Our present migratory bird legislation of 1913 and 1918 has done much. It regulates or prevents the shipment and marketing of the slaughtered birds. It should go further by a law that will give them protected avenues of flight on our navigable waters as well as absolutely safe grounds for nesting and refuge.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it the Committee on Agriculture has the call to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What committee will the call pass to next?

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that it is hoped that the Committee on Agriculture will conclude its business in time to take up some of the business from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. MONDELL. We hope to be able to do that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know of the majority leader if he can give us some information as to when we may expect unanimous-consent day and when we may expect a Private Calendar day?

Mr. MONDELL. Unanimous consent will be on Monday next and private bills as soon as we can arrange for that.

Mr. SEARS. I would like to say that many of us have private bills for constituents involving only a few hundred dollars, but they are very important.

Mr. MONDELL. We are very anxious to have them considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, we have one or two committee matters set for to-morrow and if we had not wasted this whole day we would not need to meet at 11 o'clock, and I object.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that the House meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL BUILDINGS FOR NATIONAL LEPER HOME.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 527 (Rept. No. 1597).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of (S. 3721) an act providing for the erection of additional suitable and necessary buildings for the National Leper Home; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate on said bill, one-half to be controlled by those in favor thereof and one-half to be controlled by those opposed thereto; that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, if any; the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the rule just read makes it in order for the House to consider in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a Senate bill providing additional facilities for those afflicted with leprosy in the United States. There are all told about 1,100 leprosy patients in our country. There are about 200 applications now for hospitalization as lepers who can not be provided for. Those in charge of the departments of the Government which have charge of these patients say that the situation is most serious. We already have the land and some buildings that are built to accommodate a few patients. The purpose of this legislation is to furnish facilities for taking care of those afflicted with that most dreadful disease. The bill has been reported unanimously from the committee, I believe, which had it in charge, and I am sure has the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules. If the gentleman from North Carolina desires some time, I will yield him five minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the rule is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules. The bill is a unanimous report from the committee having it in charge.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3721) providing for the erection of additional suitable and necessary buildings for the National Leper Home.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, pending that, although the rule provides that the time shall be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed to the bill, I wonder if the gentleman would agree to a unanimous consent request that the time be divided equally between himself and myself, both members of the committee, to be yielded to those who desire to speak?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3721.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3721, with Mr. SANDERS of Indiana in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3721, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3721) providing for the erection of additional suitable and necessary buildings for the National Leper Home.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be erected additional suitable buildings for the National Leper Home, at Carville, La., at a limit of cost not to exceed the sum of $650,000, which sum is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] is recognized.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is one of the really important measures that are now pending before this House. The question of what to do with and how to control the patients afflicted with leprosy is one that has bothered the people of the world for centuries. The only adequate remedy that has been found for this trouble is to segregate these poor unfortunate people in a place where they will not be a further menace to society. There are in the world to-day about 2,000,000 of these unfortunate lepers, most of them scattered through that portion of the world known as the Tropics. But we unfortunately have within the boundaries of continental United States at this time from 1,000 to 1,200 of these patients.

Several years ago the State of Louisiana had some lepers that it had to take care of, and it built in that State a State leprosarium. In 1916 a great agitation came up in the United States for a national leprosarium to take care of lepers scattered about through the several States, and in 1917 the Congress appropriated $250,000 to establish this national leprosarium. The Public Health Service took $75,000 of this money and bought the Louisiana Leper Home at Carville. They took the rest of this money and increased the size of this institution until it had a bed capacity of 200. It has been operated by the United States Public Health Service since that time; and now the institution is full to overflowing, and there are in the neighborhood of 100 to 120 applicants seeking admission to this place, and they have no quarters in which to take care of them.

The Secretary of the Treasury has written a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, dated June 13, 1922, which is appended to the report made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds when it reported this bill, and this letter gives the facts concerning the situation which is confronting the people. I will read it.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 13, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
United States Senate.

SIR: In compliance with your indorsement on a copy of bill (S. 3665) to provide additional funds to continue in effect the act providing for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy and to prevent the spread of leprosy in the United States, I have the honor to furnish you with information as follows relative to this measure, and to state that, in my opinion, the enlargement and continuance of the work is essential to the welfare of the country, and that the sum of $650,000 named in the bill is required to accomplish the purpose:

1. Reference is made to the act approved February 3, 1917, which, in effect, established a national policy of the segregation and continued care of all persons suffering from leprosy within the United States at the expense of the National Government, including their transportation from the place of origin to the national leprosarium. It provided funds for the purchase of a suitable site for a national leprosarium and for the erection of buildings thereon and appropriated a sum of $250,000 for this purpose.

2. Under this legislation the Public Health Service acquired a site and buildings formerly used by the State of Louisiana as a leprosarium and, with the money available, made improvements and extended facilities. The place was open for the reception of patients in March, 1921. Its total bed capacity is 200. At the present time it has no infirmary and is inadequate with regard to certain facilities, such as quarters, adequate dining-room space and recreation space, storage space, etc.

3. This institution is full to capacity and remains so all the time. There is not a sufficient number of beds to meet the demands. At the present time there are on file about 100 applications, and these are increasing.

4. Unless provision is supplied for the segregation, with proper care and treatment, of all lepers in the United States, the purpose of the original legislation will be defeated. This legislation was prepared for the purpose of eradicating leprosy from the United States, an entirely feasible procedure if all persons suffering from this disease are segregated. This requires, of course, a leprosarium of sufficient size to meet all demands and to receive all applicants.

5. At the present time the Public Health Service is placed in a rather embarrassing situation, since under the law it is operating a national leprosarium, but by reason of limited facilities is unable to receive into this institution the applicants from the various States of the Union.

If facilities existed and the various State health officers were satisfied that the National Government would care for all lepers found within the borders of their respective States, it is almost certain that they would make effort to find such cases and induce them to enter this institution. Such procedure would be in entire conformity with the intent of the legislation.

6. The number of lepers in the United States is unknown. Estimates have been made which vary from 500 to 1,200. From the experience of the Public Health Service since the opening of this leprosarium, there are reasons to believe that the larger number is probably more accurate than the smaller, and indications all point to the need for the construction at the present time of a total of 500 beds at the national leprosarium. This would mean an addition of 300 beds with all of the necessary attendant facilities.

7. It has been found from experience that the care of lepers does not require extensive hospital facilities, but effort is always made to house such patients in a comfortable manner with as congenial surroundings as possible. The practice is to erect buildings of a cottage type which will house small groups rather than large buildings for the large aggregation of persons.

Of course, it is also necessary to have at command first-class professional facilities for the treatment of the disease, and also for the care of those who may become acutely sick from intercurrent maladies. This, of course, requires an up-to-date infirmary. Care also has to be taken to supply recreational facilities and to furnish these persons with many things not contemplated in usual hospital care and treatment. They are required to spend their lives in the institutions and all of their various wants must be taken care of.

8. The $650,000 contemplated in this bill is to be used exclusively for the purposes of construction. It is proposed to add 300 beds to the institution, to erect an infirmary building of from 50 to 100 beds, to increase quarters, kitchen, dining-room facilities, recreation, and other facilities in accord with the expansion of the plant, to make a similar increase in its power plant and mechanical equipment, and to provide all things necessary to make this a modern plant for the care of persons suffering from leprosy.

The original act carried an appropriation of $250,000. This money was expended in the purchase of a site at a cost of $75,000 and the extension of the plant from 80 to 200 bed capacity. The money did not suffice to supply an infirmary, adequate quarters, and other necessary facilities. The $650,000 asked for to supply a total of 500 beds would therefore represent a comparatively modest cost per bed. The present situation is urgent and the additions to this plant are very much needed.

Respectfully, A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

This bill has been before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds twice. I introduced the first bill at the request of the Public Health Service. We had a hearing, and the bill was reported for passage by a unanimous vote of the committee. The same bill was introduced in the Senate, and passed the Senate and came back to the House before we could get action on the House bill. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds then acted, by a unanimous vote, in favor of the passage of the Senate bill and have brought it out on the floor for passage.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman stated that most of these unfortunate people throughout the world were in tropical territory. Does climate have anything to do with the treatment of the disease? My question is directed to the point of whether or not this is the proper location down there, so far south.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will say this: That the only treatment I know of that has been used to any great extent or has been of any benefit is an oil that comes from a tree, and is known as chaulmoogra oil. That has been of some benefit to the patients in the Hawaiian Islands, but it does not seem to beneficially affect the patients in this country. The doctors say that it is due to a difference in the climate; that the people living in a hot country have blood of a different consistency from those living in this country.

But there is this reason why this institution is a proper one to be located in a warm country: It gives a chance to all of these patients to be out of doors as much as possible. I think that the United States ought to give a vote of thanks to the State that has this institution within its borders rather than to charge it up as an institution that is of any particular benefit to that particular locality.

This is an institution that is put there for the benefit of the whole country. These people are scattered all over the country, some in solitary confinement in places provided by local authorities at a great expense to the people of that community.

Now, we had a case right here in Washington since I have been a Member of Congress. A man by the name of John Early was quartered across the river in the outskirts of the District, and they had one or two men looking after him, and attending to his wants, and guarding him to keep the general public from coming in contact with him, and to keep him from escaping; and it cost in the neighborhood of $3,000 a year to the District of Columbia and to the Government to take care of that one man. He knew about this institution in Louisiana, and one night he took French leave from this place, and they never heard of him until they found him in the Carville, La., institution, where he went on his own initiative, to be with people who were not afraid of him. He is there yet, and he went there because he could find companionship. The fact is that there is not anybody in this country who wants to associate for one minute with a leper, and if you let the information get out in a community that a leper is loose in that part of the community it would start more of a commotion than if you were to start a smallpox scare.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed his additional five minutes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I will yield to myself one minute more in order to allow the gentleman from Illinois to ask me his question.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana if there is any other institution in this country except the one in Louisiana?

Mr. ELLIOTT. There is one in Hawaii and there is one at Panama, but this is the only one in continental United States.

Mr. DENISON. I am asking particularly about continental United States. Did it come to the knowledge or information of the gentleman from Indiana as to where these other patients are? Are they kept in institutions or kept isolated in houses like the one the gentleman has described?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Some of them are running around over the country. A short time ago they found one running an elevator in New York City. I do not know what they did with him.

Mr. DENISON. Did the committee get any information as to how these scattered individual cases contracted the disease?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Some of them got it in this way: Our people are very prone to travel all over the world, and in traveling in countries where leprosy is prevalent some of them contracted the disease and brought it back with them. After a person once contracts it the only thing to do is to segregate him and put him where he will not communicate the disease to some other person.

Mr. DENISON. This disease is communicated by contact, is it not?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; it is in a measure an infectious disease.

Mr. DENISON. So far as the gentleman knows, up to this time is there any hope of curing these people?

Mr. ELLIOTT. None that I know of. The whole idea seems to be that if you can get them all segregated into one spot and keep them there until they die the disease will die with them.

Mr. MADDEN. They have cured some.

Mr. ELLIOTT. They have cured some in Hawaii, or think they have, but none in this country.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They have cured some in Hawaii.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I stated that.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And relative to their running around loose, the newspapers stated that they found two cases in the District of Columbia, and put them in this leprosarium.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose to consume very much time in the discussion of this measure. I assume that there will be no opposition to it. It is a philanthropic proposition, and one which the committee, of course, has not approached from a partisan standpoint.

Back in 1899 the Congress appointed a commission to make an investigation concerning leprosy in this country. It was discovered at that time that approximately 1,200 cases had developed in the United States. Based upon the report of that commission, the Congress at a later date—in February, 1917—authorized the establishment of a home for the treatment and, if possible, the cure of those afflicted with this dread disease. It was subsequently established in Louisiana, at the site of the leprosarium which had been built by that State, at Carville. From the standpoint of expense, it was an economical transaction for the Government. The property was purchased at a very reasonable valuation.

There are now in that institution 200 lepers. There are no accommodations for more than 200. It is estimated that there are possibly to-day 1,500 people in this country who are suffering from leprosy. The amount authorized to be appropriated by this measure will afford accommodations for 300 additional lepers. It will also provide for an infirmary, for suitable houses for lodging, for treatment of patients, and for their recreation.

Of course, this is a measure which appeals both to the head and to the heart. In our natural charitable disposition we sympathize with the people who are suffering from this dread malady. Not only does it appeal to us from that angle, but as a prophylactic measure it is highly important that we have sufficient and suitable accommodations to house all the known lepers in this land.

This is the same old leprosy of Bible days. The doctors tell us that it does not differ in kind and probably does not differ in degree from that disease which in olden times used to lead those afflicted with it to hold up their hands and cry "Unclean!" However, much progress has been made in the treatment of the disease, and it has been found that by methods similar to those employed in the treatment of tuberculosis, by proper diet, proper sanitation, proper environment that makes for a cheerful mood much may be accomplished for these people. And they have the disposition to go to this institution. There are now approximately 200 requests for admission there, with which under the present conditions those in charge are absolutely unable to comply. And some of these patients are cured. That is, they are cured in the same sense in which a person afflicted with tuberculosis is cured. The progress of the disease is so arrested that it is safe for the patients to be returned to their normal conditions of life and to mix and mingle with their friends and those who are dear to them.

So there can not be any disposition upon our part to have any antagonism to a measure of this kind. The only important inquiry is whether or not the $650,000 authorized by this measuse to be appropriated is sufficient for the purposes in hand. The authorities of the Public Health Service give us the assurance that, to the best of their information and in accordance with their best judgment, this sum is adequate for the present purposes.

This is not an institution that any of us would desire to have in our districts.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Do the officials of the surrounding parishes in that community all agree to this, so that there will be no objection to the expending of this money?

Mr. LANHAM. As stated by me before, this was the original site of the State institution in Louisiana. Of course, those people there are not anxious to have the leprosarium, but they are anxious that, inasmuch as it is there, it shall be adequate for the demands. There are, for instance, a number of lepers in the State of Louisiana, accredited to that State, who have gone there from other States in the hope that they could get into this institution. They have gone from various sections of the country.

This is an isolated settlement. It is about 4 miles from a hamlet and about 75 miles from New Orleans, and the people of Louisiana wish to have this institution enlarged in this manner. There has been no opposition to the bill. Of course, they would prefer to have no leprosy in the United States and that the necessity did not exist for this institution there, but they are thoroughly agreeable to its enlargement and the extension of its work as here contemplated. And perhaps it will work its most beneficial results for the State of Louisiana itself, because of the great influx of lepers into Louisiana from the various sections of the country in the hope of admission to this leprosarium.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to state to my colleague that I think it is very commendable that these good people of Louisiana will admit the institution. My colleague will recall that the Texas Legislature made an appropriation of several million dollars for a site, and they could not find a place or a site where they would permit them to locate it.

Mr. LANHAM. That is true, and I agree with my colleague from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT], who says that the State of Louisiana is entitled to a vote of thanks that the institution is allowed to be located there.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I was interested in the statement of the gentleman that there are now 1,500 afflicted people within the United States, and that we are providing for only about 350. Are the balance isolated?

Mr. LANHAM. The passage of this measure will provide for about 500. That is, the present accommodations are for 200 and this will add 300 more.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there are 1,000 additional that are not accommodated.

Mr. LANHAM. That is an estimate by the Public Health Service.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they isolated?

Mr. LANHAM. As I say, it is largely a matter of estimate. The period of incubation in this disease is from 3 to 30 years, and it is very difficult to tell sometimes in the early stages whether one who is suspected of having leprosy is afflicted with it or not.

Mr. BLANTON. If the only way to weed it out and to stop it is to isolate the cases and let it die out, I would be in favor of providing accommodations for every one of them.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say that I made inquiry of the Surgeon General when the very interesting hearings were had on this bill, and he thought the appropriation provided for in it would be sufficient for this purpose at present.

There is one interesting thing that developed at the hearings in regard to this disease, and that is that especially in the Philippines, where it is very prevalent, relatively, when it breaks out in a family, strange to say, the male members have it to the exclusion of the female members, and vice versa. There seems to be a kind of itch that develops on the body. The reason the spread of the disease is usually confined to a particular sex of the family seems to grow out of the fact that they frequently wear one another's clothes. The boys wear their brother's clothes handed down to them, and then contract the disease from wearing the apparel of those afflicted. The same results occur from girls wearing the garments of their afflicted sisters.

Unfortunately some of those stricken with it in the United States have been treated most mercilessly in some sections of the country. In one case, where a man was confined at the county poor farm, a purse was made up as a bribe to get him to leave that community.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I will.

Mr. DENISON. I had occasion to visit the leprosy home in the city of Habana, and I hope that no such conditions will ever exist here as I saw in 1912. The patients were all confined in a building and bars over every window—bars like an ordinary jail. The sight I saw in the city of Habana was frightful. My object in stating that is to ask the gentleman if he can give the House any information as to what this plant in Louisiana consists of and what this money is intended to do? This will amount to about $2,200 a bed.

Mr. LANHAM. I want to say that these conditions in Habana, of which the gentleman speaks, will not be duplicated in this country. This is a tract of 400 acres of good land. Instead of having large buildings, it has been found better in the treatment of leprosy to have small cottages for the patients. They are scattered around down there over these grounds. In some instances the patients are even able to get out and cultivate the land a little. They like to live there; they do not run away, but, as a matter of fact, they run to the place to be admitted. The relatives of some prominent people have been treated in that institution.

Now, the hearings show how they propose to use this money, and it is as follows:

Twenty-two 1-story cottages, each containing 11 rooms, toilets, etc., hollow tile and stucco finish	$220,000
Hospital with 50 beds, surgical provision, X-ray laboratory, general and research laboratory, dental laboratory, eye, ear, and nose clinic, electric hydrotherapeutic clinic and a pharmacy; 2-story fireproof building	125,000
Morgue, 1-story building, fireproof construction	2,000
Laundry, 1-story building, tile walls and stucco finish (exclusive of laundry equipment)	15,000
Auditorium and recreation hall, 1-story building, tile walls	30,000
Library, post office, and canteen combined, 1 story, tile construction	20,000
Kitchen and mess hall, 1 story, tile construction	75,000
Storehouse for nonperishable supplies, 1 story, tile walls, stucco finish	3,000
Storehouse for perishable supplies, 2 stories, tile construction, stucco walls, including refrigeration	20,000
Garage, 1 story, tile walls, stucco finish	10,000
Quarters for resident hospital physicians, 1 story, tile with stucco finish	10,000
Three houses for colored help, 1 story, tile walls, stucco finish	5,000
Dairy and barn, 2 stories, to accommodate 29 head of cattle and 4 horses, tile walls, stucco finish	18,000
Incinerator, additional mechanical equipment, boilers, etc	92,000
Total	645,000
Miscellaneous costs	5,000
Grand total	650,000

These are the purposes and amounts aggregating, as set out in the bill, the sum of $650,000.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the executive and medical authorities of the Government having these matters in charge have certified to us the necessity in the case. They have advised us that the amount carried in the bill will meet immediate exigencies. This authorization will prepare the way for the appropriation to follow, and I believe that the best service we can render is to pass this bill as speedily as possible. Therefore, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to discuss further the merits of this legislation. I think the urgent need of the passage of the bill is apparent to all the members of the committee who are here. It may be interesting, however, for the purposes of the RECORD, to indicate the manner in which patients may be admitted, and are admitted, into this National Leper Home at Carville, La. The law provides that there shall be received into this home, first, patients who may present themselves at the home and desire admission, who have this disease; second, persons who have been apprehended under the United States quarantine acts, and therefore are subject to disposition by the Federal authorities; third, patients who may be consigned to the home by the health authorities of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. In the last case the health authorities of any State or Territory or of the District of Columbia may make application to the Surgeon General, and he provides means for the transportation of the patient from the place where the patient may happen to be located to the home at Carville, La., if it is necessary to provide such transportation and if it is in the interest of the preservation of the public health to cause this transportation to be provided. The cost of the transportation is paid out of the Federal appropriation for the maintenance of the home.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Did the gentleman get any information that he can give to the House as to the nationality of these patients? Are there any of them foreigners, or are they all Americans?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I can only give a general impression. I do not think there is any preponderance of foreigners among them. Some of them are people who have traveled; in fact, I think most of them are people who have traveled in the Philippines and elsewhere in the world, where they have unfortunately contracted this disease, and in some cases the number has been increased by the contagion which those afflicted with the disease have communicated to others after their return to the United States.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, there are two reasons why this appropriation should be made as soon as possible. The first is because if we have the facilities for these people who are afflicted with leprosy, so that they can apply and receive early treatment, they have some chance of recovery. The second reason is that if you have quarters for these people, they go there themselves of their own free will, and that of course means protection to the public. I hope that this House will pass this appropriation and give these people relief as soon as possible.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ABERNETHY].

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, never before in the history of our country have we been confronted with a more serious problem than that which relates to our cotton industry. It is not a sectional problem; it is a nation and world-wide problem, and one which needs the prompt and vigorous action of Congress. Every Member of this body, wherever he lives or from what section he comes, is as vitally interested, if he stops to think, as we who represent what is known as the Cotton Belt.

Cotton is the most valuable fiber in the world and its production is necessary if the greater part of the human race is to be clothed.

The South supplies 80 per cent of the cotton needed, and in normal times it constitutes 60 per cent of our export trade. Europe, Asia, and Africa are almost without cotton at this time, and but for the fact that our foreign trade is almost at a standstill there would be a cotton famine.

A conservative estimate is that $2,000,000,000 are invested in the cotton manufacturing business, and it is dependent upon the South's ability to produce three-fourths of the raw material used in this industry.

This country furnishes 80 per cent of the cotton; Egypt, about 13 per cent; East India, 5 per cent; and all other countries in which cotton can be produced, 2 per cent. "All other countries" includes Russia, China, Japan, Peru, Greece, Turkey, Persia, and Mexico. The entire world outside of the United States, exclusive of Egypt and India, does not produce in a year as much cotton as does the State of Texas alone.

India, with its immense population, will always consume more cotton than it can grow. The uncertainty as to rainfall in that country is the great drawback to increased cotton production. The staple is of a much lower grade than ours, and the average yield is only 70 pounds to our 190 pounds. Egypt is a rainless country. No crops can be grown except by irrigation from the only source of water supply, the Nile. Her increase of cotton production does not meet her increased demands. Since 1873 Egypt's increase in cotton yield has only been 430,000 bales, compared with an increase of 7,000,000 bales in our Cotton Belt during the same period.

There is at large in the cotton-producing States of the Union what has been appropriately styled "the billion dollar bandit" or "the billion dollar bug." His correct name is Anthonomus grandis, commonly called the boll weevil.

This bandit operates for about a period of three months per year and in a comparatively small area of the United States, but since 1909 he has cleaned up and destroyed more than $3,000,000,000 worth of cotton.

He started his devastating march in 1892 in this country, coming across the Mexican border into Texas, and to-day he ravages the entire cotton area of the United States.

So far as we can ascertain he was born near Vera Cruz in 1843, and soon became so active and destructive in that country that the raising of cotton was abandoned and has never to any extent been resumed.

He then made his way to Cuba, and in 1871 his ravages were so great that the Cuban farmer gave up planting cotton and turned to other things.

He seems to be content to reproduce, and this he does effectively. A male and female boll weevil are capable of reproducing four or more generations each summer, the length of existence being about 60 days, and the possible progeny of a single pair of weevils from the beginning to the end of a season may amount, according to the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, to no less than 12,755,100 descendants. And when a single weevil boring into a cotton boll can destroy it, the ravages of the pest can be understood.

This "bandit" is a species of beetle with a prominent snout half the length of its body. It has elbowed antennæ at its sides and a small mouth at its tip. It is about one-fourth of an inch long. It hibernates in the wintertime in near-by woods or by concealing itself in the cotton fields. In the spring and throughout the fruiting season of cotton the eggs are deposited by the female weevils in cavities formed by eating into the fruit of the plant. An egg hatches under normal conditions in about three days, and the grub immediately begins to feed. In from 7 to 12 days the larva or grub passes into its pupa stage, corresponding to the cocoon of butterflies and moths. This stage lasts from three to five days. Then the adult issues and in about five days begins the production of another generation. Climatic conditions cause considerable variation in the duration of the stages, but, on an average, it requires from two to three weeks for the weevil to develop from the egg to the adult. Males and females are produced in about equal numbers. The males feed upon the squares and bolls without moving until the food begins to deteriorate. The females refrain most of the season from depositing in squares visited by other females, but late in the fall, when all the fruit has become infested, several eggs may be placed in a single square or boll. As many as 15 larvæ have been found in a single boll. The squares are greatly preferred as food and as places for depositing eggs. As long as a large supply of squares is present, the bolls are not damaged to any serious extent. The bolls, therefore, have a fair chance to develop as long as squares are being formed.

The cotton-boll weevil, so far as known, breeds in no plants other than cotton and the wild cotton of Arizona. At the present time, at least, the insect is restricted to the cotton plant as a means of development.

It is proper to say in this connection that the United States Department of Agriculture has been doing a great work in boll-weevil control. That great expert, Dr. L. O. Howard, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, and his valuable assistants in his department and the experts in the Bureau of Plant Industry and from the extension service have worked out a plan whereby cotton can be grown under boll-weevil conditions, and this is the plan:

SUMMARY OF SUGGESTIONS FOR THE PRODUCTION OF COTTON UNDER BOLL-WEEVIL CONDITIONS.

(This statement was prepared by a special committee and approved by the cotton council of the Department of Agriculture, and represents a summary of the department's attitude at present.)

Under boll-weevil conditions the prime necessity is to mature the largest possible crop of cotton in the shortest possible time. It is, in a sense, a race between the farmer and the boll weevil. To accomplish this end the department makes the following recommendations:

I. Select for cotton planting well-drained, fertile soils, if possible; only land capable of producing, with the use of a reasonable amount of fertilizer, at least one-half a bale per acre should be planted to cotton.

II. Prepare a good seed bed and fertilize liberally. Whatever fertilizer is used should usually be distributed in the soil before planting.

III. Plant good seed of an improved, early maturing variety recommended for the locality by the State experiment station and the United States Department of Agriculture. Plant as soon as danger from frost and cold is past and the ground is sufficiently warm to insure rapid germination and vigorous growth. The planting of seed of a single variety, as nearly simultaneously as possible, by entire communities and counties is strongly urged.

IV. The importance of securing and maintaining a full stand can not be overemphasized. The best width of rows and spacing of cotton in the row may vary with soil and climatic conditions. Rows should be only wide enough to allow proper cultivation and cotton in the drill should uniformly be spaced closer than under non-bollweevil conditions. Cotton in 3-foot rows, spaced two stalks to the hill, a hoe width apart, has given high yields in spacing tests in the Mississippi Delta. This close spacing may prove undesirable under some conditions, but spacing 8 to 12 inches in the drill, with two stalks to the hill, will probably give best results throughout the entire region of severe weevil infestation. To be sure of securing a full stand the liberal use of planting seed is advised.

V. Chop to the desired stand as soon as safe from cold or other adverse conditions. Give early and frequent cultivation and continue same until fairly late in the season; or at least two or three weeks beyond the usual "laying-by" time. Great care should be taken, particularly in the later part of the season, to cultivate shallow and not too close to the row. Careless or deep cultivation at this period may mean disaster. Careful, late, shallow cultivation is very strongly recommended.

VI. If weevils are numerous at the time cotton is just beginning to square destroy all possible adult weevils, either by hand picking or poisoning, as may be most practicable. It is probable that only at this stage the molasses and calcium arsenate mixture can be used effectively. When squaring begins, especially if not equipped to poison by dusting, pick and destroy all punctured squares from the ground and the stalk once every week or 10 days for a period of about 30 days. Then, if weevils are still numerous or as much as 10 to 15 per cent of squares are infested and other conditions warrant, apply the calcium arsenate dry dust poison. In making applications of the dust poison always carefully follow directions of the United States Department of Agriculture and the college of agriculture of your own State.

VII. Pick cotton in the fall as rapidly as possible, and immediately kill all cotton stalks, preferably by cutting and plowing under. The object is to destroy the food supply and breeding places of the weevil before the hibernation period. To be effective, this must be done as long as possible before the first killing frost. A very light infestation, or even practical immunity from weevil damage until late in the following season, could be insured if all cotton growers in entire communities or counties would, when conditions permit, cooperate to destroy all cotton stalks at least two or three weeks before frost.

VIII. Since the weevil will hibernate successfully not only in woodland but in any trash or rubbish, it is very good practice to burn over or clean up any such situations around the cotton fields during the winter, especially the fence rows, terraces, ditch banks, and ravines.

And it is well in this connection to give the following suggestions of Mr. W. B. Mercer, of the Department of Agriculture:

PREPARATION OF SEED BED.

In most cases early, moderately deep breaking of the land is best for cotton. Where vegetable matter is to be turned under and where there is little danger of serious washing, early breaking is desirable. If the breaking is done more than three or four weeks before planting time, the land should be rebedded. This, however, need not be as deep as before. The second breaking should, as a rule, be done much more rapidly. Sometimes a thorough disking or stirring of the soil with a cultivator will be sufficient. It matters not when the breaking is done, the surface soil should be thoroughly pulverized with disk and smoothing harrows before seeding. The young cotton plant needs a well-prepared soil to start in, as the roots are delicate and near the surface. Unless the land was broken before rains, a roller or drag should be used to firm the seed bed. This holds moisture, which is necessary to good germination.

DATE OF PLANTING.

The dates for planting cotton range from March 25 to May 25, depending upon latitude, season, and soil conditions. The good condition of the soil and the temperature are more important than a fixed date for planting. Cotton should be planted just as soon as the soil is warm enough for quick germination and rapid growth of the young plants. Both extra early and extra late planting are to be avoided. If planted too early, the crop may be killed by late frosts or stunted in growth and the expense of cultivation is increased, while, on the other hand, if planting is delayed the crop will be in danger of drought, early frost, and various insect pests. The sowing of the seed is usually done with a planter. There are several very satisfactory planters on the market. Choose the one that conserves seed and drops it regularly at a uniform depth.

DEPTH OF PLANTING.

The depth for planting cottonseed is important. Ordinarily it should not be planted more than 1 inch deep, provided that depth reaches moisture. When the temperature and moisture are right, plants will come up very quickly. In dry soils or when planting late in the season it may be necessary to cover seed more than 1 inch. As a rule, more poor stands are caused from planting too deep than too shallow. When seed is planted in a continuous drill, 3 pecks of good seed per acre are sufficient. Half this amount will give a good stand when planted at the proper depth on a well-prepared seed bed. It is usually safest to use a rather generous amount of seed, so that early cultivation can be done with less danger of injuring the stand.

SPACING.

There are many opinions regarding the proper spacing of cotton. There is a pretty general uniformity in agreement on the width of the rows. The standard rows are from 3½ to 4½ feet. This depends somewhat on the nature of the soil, but under any conditions the width of the rows should be arranged to suit the cultivators that will be available. The diversity of opinion is on the spacing of plants in the rows. The practice of good farmers and results from the early experiments under normal conditions and before the boll weevil seem to favor rather wide spacing in the row. Recent experiments under boll-weevil conditions, and even under normal conditions, indicate that closer spacing gives a greater yield. Where the chief object is early maturity and the combating of serious insect pests, thicker spacing of the plants in the row will give more satisfactory results. There is perhaps need for some further experiments to arrive at the approximate distance, worked out on a scale suitable to the soil and climate in which the plants are to be grown.

FERTILIZER.

Commercial fertilizers were not used for cotton until about 1860. Where judiciously used they have always given good results. Millions of dollars' worth are now used annually in the cotton regions. The present deplorable financial condition in the cotton States is largely due to the extravagant use of commercial fertilizer, bought at very high prices on credit. Every good farmer or agricultural adviser knows the benefit to be derived from a reasonable application of fertilizer on practically all cotton lands. The great mistake has been that the cotton farmer has come to depend almost entirely on fertilizers for producing good yields rather than on crop rotation in which soil-building crops are used. The exercise of more intelligence in the buying and use of fertilizers and the adoption of a rotation system throughout the cotton territory would result in the saving of millions of dollars and at the same time secure better yields at less expense on fewer acres.

CULTIVATION.

Frequent and early cultivation is essential to promote rapid growth, to retain moisture, and to destroy weeds. When possible, the weeder or section harrow should be run over the fields before the plants come up. As soon as the plants are up to a good stand, run the section harrow again at an angle of 45 degrees diagonally across the rows. On very loose or sandy soils the weeder will be better than the harrow. Cultivation should be continued throughout the growing season each week or 10 days, until the plants have taken on a full crop of bolls and squares. After the first few weeks, cultivation should be shallow, as the cotton plant has a great mass of roots near the surface, and these should not be broken to any great extent. On most soils the cultivation should be kept up much later than is ordinarily done.

How can Congress help this matter? By granting liberal appropriations to the Department of Agriculture. This should be done without stint, for the situation is so critical that no other agency than the Government can hope to successfully cope with it.

There is now pending before the House, Union Calendar No. 557, Senate Joint Resolution 265:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production during the calendar year 1923 and 1924, and to dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated and the proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate may be used, at the discretion of the President, during the calendar year 1923 and 1924 as a revolving fund for the purposes herein named.

This resolution passed the Senate unanimously and has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture.

It is warmly indorsed by the Secretary of Agriculture and should pass the House without opposition.

The nitrate of soda is principally secured in Chile. Nitrates needed during the war were secured in the way provided for in this resolution. Nitrate of soda is absolutely essential to the cotton farmer to enable him to push the growth of the cotton to combat the boll weevil.

Nitrate of soda is not only essential to the cotton farmer but to farmers generally in various parts of the country.

In this resolution it is proposed for the President to buy the nitrate of soda and sell it to the farmer at cost. The Government did this during the war and has never lost a dollar. It is not in reality an appropriation, as the Government collects the money in advance from the farmer, most of whom are small tenant farmers, and by this method are enabled to get this most necessary fertilizer, otherwise they could not get it.

The calcium arsenate is the only poison which has been found to destroy the boll weevil.

Arsenic is a metallic element. It is found in many localities but in commercial form it is produced almost entirely as a by-product of the smelting industry—a by-product heretofore largely due to legislation. Wherever smelters have been erected laws have been passed compelling them to control the fumes of arsenic let loose from their smokestacks. The dust in the smokestack and in the flues of a smelter is refined by revolatilizing and grinding for the arsenic market. Obviously, the activity of the smelters is regulated by the price of copper and lead, and the supply of crude arsenic is greater or less according to the activity of the metals market.

The chief sources of supply are at Midvale, Utah, where the American Smelting & Refining Co. has a maximum production of 8 tons per day. The American Smelting & Refining Co. plants at Murray, Utah, East Helena, Mont., and Leadville, Colo., have a combined maximum output of 10 tons per day; and the Anaconda Copper Co., at Butte, Mont., has a maximum output of not exceeding 35 tons per day. The total maximum output under the best possible conditions would be 60 tons per day, or a total maximum American production of 18,000 tons per annum, figuring 300 working days per year.

It is perfectly possible to mine arsenic-bearing ores and treat them primarily for the recovery of arsenic as a metal itself. The production of arsenic is susceptible of being materially increased by the outlay of large amounts of additional capital, and such additional capital can not readily be attracted until the permanency of the demand and price of raw arsenic is more certain.

The foreign sources of supply of arsenic are confined practically to Japan and Germany. The greatest amount available from these two countries has been 4,200 tons in any single year, of which 2,200 tons have been procured from Japan and the balance from Germany, who had on hand a large stock. The German supplies originated in what is now Poland, and production there seems suspended. Other sources of supply in limited amounts are Australia, South Africa, Korea, Canada, and Mexico.

Calcium arsenate is 40 per cent arsenic and 60 per cent calcium of lime.

In a soluble form the arsenic would kill the cotton plant when absorbed by it, but after being mixed with calcium and rendered insoluble it is dusted by night over a cotton field. Small undissolved particles of calcium arsenate in a drop of dew are drunk by the boll weevil. It takes from 5 to 7 pounds to dust an acre at one application, and from three to four applications are necessary during the cotton-growing season.

From the foregoing information the House should be convinced of the urgent necessity of this legislation. With a fixed appropriation which the Government can spend for calcium arsenate, a market is fixed for the poison, and it is not dependent upon the price of copper and lead, as is now the case. With the Government coming to the aid of the farmer in this emergency it will enable him to control the boll-weevil pest and raise a sufficient amount of cotton to supply the needs of the world. Without governmental aid in this emergency I can see no hope for the continued production of sufficient cotton for our needs.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I would not under ordinary circumstances take up any of your time, because I think you are prepared to vote in favor of this bill unanimously. It carries its own merit upon its face, and if it did not I believe the debate here this afternoon has clearly demonstrated that it is a very meritorious measure.

I have taken the floor for the purpose of gathering information from any Member of this House upon a matter that has worried me for some time. A man named Willard Centlivre in all probability did more to stimulate the thought of the people of this country upon the subject of leprosy than any other unfortunate individual who was ever afflicted with that dreadful disease during all the course of its history. Some years before his case a man named Early was incarcerated down here on the banks of the Potomac in this District. It was stated that it cost approximately $3,000 a year to take care of Early. Then came Centlivre. Centlivre was born and reared in the lower section of the city of New Orleans. I used to know him well. He used to attend political meetings and was somewhat of a character in the Latin quarter of that city. He came to Washington and created a sensation which rang its way clear across the continent. He said he came here as the vanguard of an army of lepers, who would assemble in Washington, march down the Avenue to the White House, and there petition for a redress of grievances. The story was put into every newspaper from ocean to ocean. I never suspected that Centlivre was gifted with any ability to obtain his ends dramatically, but he certainly did know how to play his part magnificently. On the day he arrived in Washington he walked into this old house over here, the Public Health Service, which is attended with some historical significance, for it was once occupied by Gen. Ben Butler, a man who won (?) his way into the affections of the people of New Orleans some years ago, as history records, and calmly said, "I am a leper." In the twinkling of an eye that building was entirely cleared of every occupant. Doors that opened by pulling them inward were opened outward by the rush to sunlight and the open air. Windows were not barriers; they were exits for those who rapidly got out. He was monarch of all he surveyed, and for the first time in his life he was an Alexander Selkirk. He looked over the landscape, and was apparently satisfied with his act and what he had accomplished. But after a few moments the office force regained its composure and came back, summoned the police, and Centlivre was escorted not into the jail but away down here on the banks of the Potomac, where Early had found, I hope, commodious quarters.

The Washington Times and the other newspapers at once in some manner interviewed him and his interview was a rather startling one. He declared he had joined the Army at the call of his country, had passed the physical examination, and met every test the service required. In other words, he became a soldier of the World War. Some time after an eruption began to appear upon his body. He was treated rather heroically. He was placed, according to his statement, under sand and kept there for hours. Other drastic treatment was administered but without good effect. Finally, when recovery did not seem to be apparent to his mind, he left the camp. But he was brought back, charged with desertion, court-martialed and then he made this statement that in all probability marks him out as a man, pure white, with a heart of gold, and a soul that fits him for Olympian heights. He said: "I did desert; I did leave. I told you I was afflicted with leprosy. You would not believe it. I did what decency required of me. If I never performed in my life any other act of decency, I have on this occasion, and I ought to be commended for it. I refused to communicate from my person this awful disease to others. You would not let me go, and I left, not for my own sake but for the others whom the service of our country forces to associate with me. Now carry out the sentence if you will, but I have told you the truth." He was convicted but sentence was suspended. I asked for an investigation of that case and the report of the Secretary of War shows that practically all of those statements were true and correct. His officers, who were flayed in that report, appealed, and that appeal, to the best of my information, is still pending. At any rate I never heard anything of the case afterwards. I was not so much concerned at the outcome of the case and of the court-martial in so far as it affected his military reputation, for that will be soon forgot, "for he is a pauper whom nobody owns," but I wanted to secure for his family some relief if I could. He had a mother down there in New Orleans who was bereft of his support, and he is incarcerated in Carville now, and will in all probability end his days there. I was informed by the Veterans' Bureau, in a letter which they transmitted to me, and which expressed regret at their inability to be helpful, that inasmuch as he had been convicted of desertion, though sentence was suspended, nothing could be done. The court-martial dared not, they could not, with this supreme act of self-sacrifice and decency, as he put and expressed it, sentence that man and put the sentence into execution. This man's leprosy was of service origin. That is what the record establishes. I do not know—I am not a doctor—I do not know anything other than what the record shows.

All I know about leprosy is that it is as old as the human race and that it marched forth with the race from Asia into every place that wandering men and women have gone. The committee appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate the case found that the leprosy was of service origin, but that the sentence, though suspended, the verdict, the judgment of the court-martial, precluded him from getting relief. I introduced a bill and it was sent first to one committee which declined jurisdiction, and in all probability it was absolutely correct, and then to another committee, and it declined jurisdiction. I am up against it or fate is against Centlivre. And as a consequence this poor devil, who is still in Carville, far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, has the bitter reflection to-day that though it was found his unfortunate disease—his affliction—was due to service origin, in the service of his country, and though poverty stricken, his wretched mother can not get the relief to which she is justly entitled. If there is a man in the House who knows how I can get relief for this poor devil and his still more unfortunate mother, I would like to have that information?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask that the gentleman have one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in control of the gentfeman from Indiana and the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HILL. May I ask whether the gentleman has considered introducing a bill to correct the military record of this man?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand from the letter I received from The Adjutant General that there is no power in this country, not even the President, that can remove the charge of desertion.

Mr. HILL. Congress removes the charge of desertion day after day by bills introduced.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand it that will remove the stigma, but it does not make it retroactive and go back. It simply changes the record without altering the fact. That is what has been held repeatedly by the Pension Bureau.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will put in a bill to correct the military record and remove the charge of desertion——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLACK. It certainly would be within the power of the Congress to remove charges of desertion.

Mr. HILL. He was not discharged for desertion, he was only suspended, and the gentleman can put a bill in.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will be glad to take it up with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is one of my pleasures to have the opportunity at this time to vote for this legislation. A number of years ago there were several lepers in Washington, with no place to put them and nobody to take care of them. We had a similar condition in California.

The location of this institution down in Louisiana seems to be ideal. My good friend from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], for whom I have the highest respect, approves this heartily, location and all, and in fact the entire surroundings are such that the bill undoubtedly will receive the unanimous vote of the Members of the House, and these unfortunate people will be taken care of. And above and beyond that, we relieve the awful condition that would confront the general public if they are not provided for.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The hearings on this bill disclose the fact that there are a number of cases of leprosy mostly among orientals out on the Pacific coast, particularly in California. Did the gentleman's legislature make any provision for taking care of them before this Louisiana institution was established?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; but it is hard to get a location on the mainland, and the people of California have been tremendously interested in the matter, and are willing to go the limit in providing for these people, to take care of them in the first instance; and, second, to remove them from having any contact with others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The bill was again read.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 3721) providing for the erection of additional suitable and necessary buildings for the National Leper Home, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the similar House bill will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 661. An act for the relief of Arthur Frost; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1031. An act for the relief of Eugene K. Stoudemire; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1103. An act for the relief of Frank Vumbaca; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1280. An act for the relief of Eli N. Sonnenstrahl; to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 3071. An act to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Edward N. McCarty; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 4085. An act for the relief of Samuel H. Butler; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 4248. An act to fix the compensation of employees in post offices for overtime services performed in excess of eight hours daily; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

S. 4379. An act to amend section 1709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 4313. An act for the payment of claims for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army; to the Committee on War Claims.

S. 4366. An act for the relief of W. Ernest Jarvis; to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 855. An act for the relief of Fred G. Leith, United States Navy;

H. R. 6204. An act to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla., and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes;

H. R. 12007. An act providing for the conveyance of certain land to the city of Boise, Idaho, and from the city of Boise, Idaho, to the United States;

H. R. 12887. An act granting a pension to Jacob F. Rosenberger;

H. R. 11389. An act for the relief of Robert Guy Robinson; and

H. R. 13696. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

LEAVE TO A COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING THE SESSION.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 14, the Committee on Foreign Affairs be permitted to sit during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday, February 14, the Committee on Foreign Affairs be permitted to sit during the session of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OLIVER (at the request of Mr. JEFFERS), for to-day, on account of illness in his family;

To Mr. WEBSTER (at the request of Mr. HADLEY), for the day, on account of illness; and

To Mr. ALMON, for the balance of the day, on account of illness in his family.

EXERCISES IN MEMORY OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE OSBORNE.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Sunday, the 25th of this month, time be set aside for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of the late Hon. HENRY Z. OSBORNE, a Member of Congress from the tenth district of California.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that on Sunday, February 25, time be set aside for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. HENRY Z. OSBORNE, from the tenth district of California. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, several months ago I obtained permission of the House to extend in the RECORD a eulogy upon former Senator Henry M. Teller, and it was never extended in the RECORD. I now renew that same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, for 50 years former Senator Teller was an incentive and an inspiration to the youth of our State, and what little success in public life many of us have obtained has been largely due to humbly trying to emulate his exemplary life, rare capabilities, marvelous energy, supreme loyalty, and conscientious devotion to the public welfare. His was a life of untiring service to our country and to Colorado. There never was a more loyal son of the West. He was indeed universally revered as Colorado's "Grand Old Man."

He was the best Secretary of the Interior this Nation has ever had. He was an honor to that great office and to our country. He breathed the very spirit of the mountains and plains. His heart always beat for the early pioneers. He was one of them. He personally knew their hardships and struggles. He instinctively sympathized with the human side of subduing the wilderness and reclaiming the frontier.

No man ever could be better qualified or prepared to suitably occupy that high office, and in addition he was ideally temperamentally suited to the position. Nothing outside of the performance of his official duties ever attracted his attention for one moment, and no one ever questioned the honesty or justice of any of his official actions.

After a half century constantly and loyally devoted to his country and to upbuilding the West, when he passed to the great beyond he had the priceless heritage of all the ages—a good name. Surrounded by a million temptations—

He left a name without a stain,
And a reputation without a blemish.

It was my very great privilege to have helped in an humble way to elect him four times to the United States Senate. Twice as a modest worker in the party ranks and twice as a member of the Colorado State Senate, and for a third of a century I had almost a filial affection for him, and I hope to live to see his statue placed in the Hall of Fame in the Capitol Building of our country.

I regret exceedingly that ill health and press of official business has imperatively prevented me from personally preparing as best I could a suitable tribute to the admirable life, wonderful work, and superb character of Senator Teller. But some time ago I asked the Hon. Thomas F. Dawson, the historian and curator of the State Historical and Natural History Society of Colorado, and who was for 30 years the private secretary of Senator Teller, to prepare for me a record of all those years of his close association—a memorial that would be, like the Senator himself, plain, natural, honest, and unassuming.

Fortunately for Colorado and for our country, Mr. Dawson has cheerfully, patriotically, and most admirably complied with my request and has prepared a wonderfully comprehensive, fitting, and eloquent eulogy of the most distinguished citizen and efficient statesman that the Centennial State has ever produced, and in pursuance of the permission which is now given me again to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD in memory of Senator Teller I am proud to insert Mr. Dawson's splendid tribute, as follows:

SENATOR TELLER.

[By Thomas Fulton Dawson.]

A quarter of a century ago the name of Henry M. Teller was familiar to every newspaper reader in the country and to students of economics and international affairs throughout the civilized world. He was then a Member of the United States Senate, in which body he served the State of Colorado continuously from 1877 to 1909 with the exception of three years, spent as a member of the Cabinet. From the time of his entrance upon his senatorial duties until he voluntarily relinquished the office he was much in the limelight of public discussion, but the subject which engaged more of his attention than any other was that of national and international finance. He studied all phases of this most important branch of economics, but he gave especial attention to bimetallism—the free coinage of silver.

So strong was his advocacy of this cause as a national policy that its abandonment of it led him to desert the party he had served for almost half a century and came near making him the presidential candidate of the silver supporters. And the evident sincerity and convincing character of his plea for universal acceptance of the double standard attracted the attention of the best thinkers the world over.

But it was not alone his connection with bimetallism which attracted attention to Mr. Teller. He endeared himself to the people of his own State of Colorado by his untiring devotion to and championship of their interests in the many problems which came up for adjustment between the new State and the National Government. Nation-wide attention was drawn to him by his participation in all phases of legislation. A deep student along many lines throughout his life, he always was prepared to take part in the consideration of almost any subject that came before the Senate, while his knowledge of western affairs made him an ideal Secretary of the Interior, in which capacity he served during the administration of President Chester A. Arthur.

While he made no claims to oratory as generally understood, Mr. Teller was a forceful speaker, and his logic, sincerity, and knowledge of facts gave his arguments appealing and convincing weight. He never uttered a word in debate or elsewhere that he did not believe to be the truth, and he never espoused any cause which he did not consider to be in the interest of the general welfare. It was these qualities which inspired general admiration for the man and led people to look upon him as a leader. There are many who believe that if Mr. Bryan had not been named as the Democratic candidate for President in 1896 Mr. Teller would have been. Moreover, I was once told by a man high in the counsels of the Republican Party that Roscoe Conkling had said to him previous to the Republican convention in 1880 that if General Grant could not be nominated for the Presidency by that convention he believed Teller to be the most available man and the man best fitted for the nomination. We know, however, that by the time Grant was beaten in that convention the body had gotten entirely away from Conkling and his cohorts and that all he could do was to name a man for Vice President, which he did in the person of General Arthur. It is significant that when, through a fateful series of circumstances, Arthur became President, Teller was one of the first advisers he called in, and that he invited the Colorado man into his Cabinet as one of his first official acts.

However, we speak not of Mr. Teller as a possible presidential candidate. Even to this day he is known by all who were acquainted with him as "Senator Teller," and I believe that if he could speak and if he could have his own choice in the matter he would prefer thus to be known. He was an ideal Senator; he looked and acted the part, and he believed in the Senate.

His record in the Senate, in the Interior Department, and in private life is such as to entitle him to a place in the country's hall of fame. It is especially fitting that a few of the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should be devoted to the preservation of the story of his life, and I feel greatly honored in being designated to prepare it. The great pity is that it can not be longer than space here will permit. It is not any easy story to write, however, especially in condensed form. To properly cover the subject one should consult the files of the RECORD and the Senate Journal for the almost third of a century which Mr. Teller served the Nation. In the space here allotted only the outlines can be traced. Here is the framework of the man's life:

Henry Moore Teller was born in Allegany County, N. Y., May 23, 1830. He received an academic education, worked on the farm during the summer, and taught school in the winter. His academic course completed, he took up the study of the law and was admitted to the bar in January, 1858, at Binghamton, N. Y.

Shortly after his admission he removed to Morrison, Whiteside County, Ill., where he practiced his profession until 1861. Then he went to Colorado, and, locating in Central City, the center of the gold-mining section, he soon became a leading influence at the bar and among the people.

Mr. Teller was one of the projectors of the Colorado Central Railroad, now a part of the Colorado & Southern system. He drafted its charter, and in 1865, in connection with W. A. H. Loveland, of Golden City, presented it to the Territorial legislature then sitting at that place, and secured its adoption. For five years he was president of that road.

During the Indian disturbances of 1863–64 he was appointed major general of the Territorial militia by Gov. John Evans, and served two years in that capacity.

At the beginning of his political career Mr. Teller was a Democrat, which was the faith of his father, but when in 1854 the Republican Party came into existence he united with it and became an ardent supporter of its principles. He held no elective office until 1876, although one of the most active political campaigners in the field. Upon the admission of Colorado as a State he was elected to the United States Senate by the first general assembly that convened in Denver November 1, 1876.

During all the preceding years Henry M., in association with his brother Willard, who joined him in Colorado in 1864, was constantly engaged in the practice of law, rising to the leadership in his profession. The brothers occupied a small white painted frame building of two rooms on Eureka Street, Central City, and in that building some legal transactions of great magnitude were arranged, as were also many political conferences.

In 1882 President Arthur appointed Mr. Teller Secretary of the Interior to succeed Samuel J. Kirkwood, but his term ended with the passing of President Arthur, March 3, 1885. The following day Mr. Teller again took his seat as a Senator from Colorado, having been elected to succeed N. P. Hill. He was reelected in 1891 without opposition in his party for the term expiring in March, 1897.

He served as chairman on the Committees on Pensions, Patents, Mines and Mining, and Privileges and Elections, and as a member of the Committee on Claims, Railroads, the Judiciary, Appropriations, Public Lands, and many other committees.

From 1896 forward Senator Teller opposed the Republican Party because of its repudiation of silver, and for the most part acted with the Democratic Party.

In 1886 Alfred University conferred upon him the degree of LL. D.

Senator Teller was a prominent member of the Masonic Order, attaining the thirty-third degree, Scottish Rite, and he was honored by the grand lodge of Colorado in an unusual degree.

January 24, 1903, Senator Teller was reelected to the United States Senate by the State legislature for the full term of six years, expiring March 3, 1909. This, by his own voluntary desire, completed his long term of years in the Senate, for he determined to retire finally from public service, in which the better part of his life had been passed.

To insure the benefit of his talents beyond the expiration of his senatorship, Senator Teller was appointed a member of the United States Monetary Commission, created to investigate the financial conditions of the country and to devise a plan for instituting a system whereby the frequently recurring monetary disturbances in our present system might be avoided. In the discharge of the duties involved Senator Teller visited all parts of the country, conferring with bankers and other influential men on the subject in hand. He also spent much time in studying the foreign monetary systems. The labors of this commission resulted in the formulation of a banking system which is generaly recognized as the foundation of the reserve bank system which was adopted later.

At Cuba, N. Y., June 7, 1862, Mr. Teller married Harriet M., daughter of Packard Bruce, a farmer, of Allegany County. Three children were born to them—Emma A., John Harrison, and Henry Bruce—all in Central City. Mr. Teller died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Emma Teller Tyler, in Denver, February 23, 1914. Mrs. Teller and the daughter and sons survive.

This is a mere skeleton of a record which is full of interesting details, and it would not be fair to leave it there. I shall undertake to supply some of the important omissions, and I am permitted by the State Historical and Natural History Society of Colorado to copy from its files the following statement by Hon. James H. Teller, a brother, regarding the Senator's early life:

EARLY DAYS.

"Henry M. Teller was born on a farm in the town of Granger, Allegany County, N. Y. This farm was part of a considerable tract purchased by his grandfather in 1814. The Tellers were of Holland Dutch ancestry, descending from William Teller, who came to New York—New Netherlands—in 1639. His mother was a Moore and was descended from Deacon Samuel Chapin, one of the first settlers of Springfield, Mass. He united in his blood the original Knickerbocker and the pure New England strain.

"After getting such an education as was possible in the country schools he attended Rushford Academy, at Rushford, N. Y., and later was graduated from Alfred University. Before entering upon his law studies he made a trip to Cincinnati to visit an uncle on his mother's side, going down the Allegheny River to Pittsburgh on a lumber raft. He earned a part of his expenses in school at times by hauling lumber from local mills to points where it could be shipped on the Erie Canal. After finishing college he became principal of the schools at Angelica, N. Y., the county seat of Allegany County, and while there teaching he studied law in the office of Martin Grover, an eminent lawyer who was afterwards one of the judges of the New York Court of Appeals.

"At Angelica he made the acquaintance of a man named Penney, who on a trip to Illinois learned that one H. A. Johnson, then practicing law at Morrison, county seat of Whiteside County, Ill., desired a partner. Penney advised Henry M. of the fact, and he thereupon went to Binghamton, N. Y., where the supreme court was meeting, and where examinations for admission to the bar were held for the district in which Angelica was situated. Having been admitted to the bar, he proceeded at once to Morrison, formed a partnership with Mr. Johnson, and entered upon the practice of law. That was in 1858.

"In 1860 he took an active part in the selection of delegates to the Illinois Republican State Convention; was in the county convention and supported delegates pledged to Richard Yates, a candidate for nomination for Governor on the Republican ticket. There was a bitter contest over the delegates, and Henry M. got the floor at one time, and held it during the greater part of the night, thereby gaining the delegates for Yates. That delegation assured Yates's nomination, and he was one of the most prominent war governors, the man who gave Grant his first commission.

"Henry M. was a spectator at the Chicago convention which nominated Mr. Lincoln in 1860.

"In that year his partner joined the throng moving to what was then known as the Pikes Peak region, and settled at Central City, then known, I believe, as Mountain City.

"In April, 1861, Henry M. came to Colorado to visit his partner, arriving in Denver on the day which Fort Sumpter was fired upon. Having proceeded to Central City, he was induced to remain there, his brother Willard coming on from New York and taking over the Morrison business.

"It is related that while teaching a country school in New York before he had finished his college course an obstreperous young man defied him and undertook to break up the school. The final result was that the young man ran out of the schoolhouse with the teacher after him, the race continuing for something like half a mile, when the young man was overtaken in a swamp where he found the mud too deep for rapid transit. He was thoroughly subdued by the incident and discipline was restored in the school.

"While Henry M. and Willard were students at Rushford Academy they boarded themselves to a considerable extent, going home from time to time for fresh supplies.

"Reverting again to his stay in Morrison, where I lived as a boy, though after he left, I should say that he early achieved a prominent place at the bar and there, as elsewhere, showed remarkable ability to secure the confidence of the people. The older farmers of Whiteside County during his subsequent political career regarded his course with great interest, as one whom they had well known in his early years.

"My knowledge of his boyhood is only known from hearsay, but from all that I learned from my parents he was in his youth always studious, generous, and ambitious. He had the advantage of parents who highly appreciated education, and they encouraged and helped him in all possible ways. He was in his early years, as he was later on, a model son."

The files of the Historical Society also contain an interview with Mrs. Teller, widow of the Senator, in which she gives additional particulars concerning him, both before and after their marriage. After telling of meeting him at Angelic while he was teaching and she attending a young ladies' seminary there, of her return to her home in Cuba, N. Y., and his subsequent location there, where they became engaged, she proceeds:

"He had not long been in Cuba when he was called away by a summons to go to Illinois to practice law. This came about through a friend who was acquainted with Mr. Hiram A. Johnson, who had gone from New York to Morrison, Ill., and established a flourishing law practice.

"Mr. Johnson wrote to this friend asking him to recommend some young man as a law partner. As I have said, Mr. Teller had a fine reputation as a student of law and of general affairs even from the beginning, and when the letter came from Johnson the friend lost no time in recommending Mr. Teller. As soon as the mails could go out and return the invitation came and it was accepted on the condition that Mr. Teller should have time before going West to become a member of the New York bar. He felt that admission in the older and stricter State of New York would be a higher recommendation than such admission in Illinois. I recall the time very well, for by then we had become engaged to be married. Thorough student that he was, he encountered no difficulty in taking the examination and he soon was on his journey to the West.

"Soon after Mr. Teller's arrival in Morrison Mr. Johnson became interested in the reports of gold discoveries in the Rocky Mountains which then flooded the country, and notwithstanding the law firm of Johnson & Teller was engaged in a prosperous practice, the senior member of it resolved upon a personal inspection. He went direct to Central City and was so impressed that he began writing to Mr. Teller and urging him to join him there. So insistent was he that 'H. M.' decided to make a visit here to determine the question for himself. He came in April, 1861, and remained.

"Mr. Johnson's judgment concerning the outlook in Colorado proved to be good. The firm soon became popular and it was not long until they were getting the cream of the law business in the new town. Mr. Teller made a specialty of mining law, and soon was such a master of its intricacies that he had few rivals in that line at the Colorado bar. His reputation spread and before a great while his practice extended throughout the territory. The firm was prosperous and the two men became not only partners but close friends. After a while Willard Teller came out and was invited to become a member of the firm, which he did."

Mr. and Mrs. Teller were married in 1862 and she relates that she made nine trips over the 2,000 miles between Central City and Cuba during the eight years intervening before the first railroad reached Colorado.

"When first married," continued Mrs. Teller, "we went to Central to live, occupying a part of the same house in which the Johnsons lived, but it was divided into two apartments. It was a frame building and I recall that it was necessary to stake it down to prevent its blowing away. The wind would come up suddenly at almost any unexpected time and would swirl down the gulch with such ferocity that there was always danger of buildings being swept away until the owners learned how to make them secure. Before we were married the upper story of the house in which Mr. Teller lived was lifted up and carried off and all his effects scattered in all directions, some of them landing in the Clear Creek. We still have a watch of his which was picked up in the street and returned to him after the storm subsided."

Mr. Teller has left a brief statement of his own concerning his coming to Colorado. In an interview printed in the Denver Post of May 26, 1911, he said:

"Mr. Johnson had invested in mines in Colorado. He wanted me to come West with him. I refused, thinking Colorado was too barbaric and rough to live in. Rich gold mines had been discovered in the fifties, and many people were going West. In 1860 South Carolina seceded and the war seemed inevitable. In the winter of 1861 Mr. Johnson asked me if I wouldn't come to Colorado. I said I would come for a month, but was sorry after I had committed myself. I dreaded the hardship. By train I got to St. Joe, the western terminal. For seven days and nights we sat in a stage coach, and reached Central City on April 27, 1861. Denver was the stopping place for the main stage line, and when I rode into this town it had about a thousand population. I would hate to describe it. You know the State didn't prohibit gambling, and liquor didn't seem to be a thing to fear. Very few families were here."

Lest there should be a misunderstanding because of the obscure wording of the above reference to the Civil War, it should be stated that while on his way out Mr. Teller dispatched a message to Washington tendering his services in raising troops in the Rocky Mountain region to aid in the suppression of the rebellion, but the proffer was declined on account of the cost of transportation.

In his contribution concerning his brother's early life Judge Teller, for many years and now a justice of the Supreme Court of Colorado, has mentioned a visit to Cincinnati. That visit did not end in the Ohio town, however, but extended to Kentucky. It should be stated here that the instinct for life in the West was developed at an early age in Henry M., and he made his first venture in that direction at the time of which Judge Teller speaks. He went to Kentucky to teach school, and located near Lexington at that time; but this was in prewar days, and slavery was an established institution there. This condition and the attitude of the people on the subject did not appeal to him, and he soon returned.

I have heard him tell of this experience, and I especially remember his story of his trip. He had no money to pay his fare on such an extended journey, but finding a man on the banks of the Allegheny River, which flowed near his home, who was collecting a big raft of lumber to be floated down, he made an arrangement with him to assist in the work in exchange for meals and transportation to Cincinnati. This was characteristic of the man. He did not shirk work, and he always found a way of doing what he wished to do. It also is true that he never compromised himself by remaining amidst undesirable surroundings, as was illustrated in his refusing to reside in a slaveholding community. He returned to his uncle's home and thence made his way back to the paternal roof in New York.

The next move, as we have seen, was to Illinois, and thence to Colorado, where he arrived not long after he was 30 years old.

POLITICAL CAREER.

With the exception of his inconspicuous service as general of the Colorado Militia during the Civil War, Mr. Teller held no public office until the admission of the State into the Union in 1876, when he was chosen one of the State's first two United States Senators.

The interim between his advent in Colorado and his election to the Senate was devoted in the main to the practice of law; but, always public spirited, he was conspicuous in every movement in the interest of the general welfare of the people of the Territory. He was a participant in most public meetings, and his counsel soon came to be accepted as the word of wisdom. From the beginning he was a leader in the Republican Party and never was there a campaign in those days in which his services were not in general demand on the stump and in the counsel chamber.

When Denver obtained railroad connection with the outside world, he bent his energies to procure the same advantages for the mountain towns, all of them prosperous through their mines, and thus became greatly interested in the Colorado Central road running from Denver up Clear Creek and extending by means of different branches to Georgetown and Central City.

He opposed the admission of the Territory into the Union as a State for a time on the ground that the population was not sufficient to justify the experiment; but when conditions improved in 1876 he was among the supporters of the movement.

In a word, when Colorado came into the Union, Teller was regarded as the leading lawyer of the State, if not its leading citizen. Everybody regarded him as best fitted for the office of Senator. He was not, however, the foremost candidate. Believing that the office should seek the man, then, as afterwards, he refused to press his own claims.

This election was the most important event in Mr. Teller's life and necessarily deserves especial attention in any review of his career.

Admitted into the Union in the centennial year, Colorado has been represented in the Senate of the United States by 13 different men. Of these, two only have been elected for more than one full term, the two thus favored being Henry M. Teller and Edward O. Wolcott. Teller was elected for five full terms and one fractional term, and he served four full terms and two fractional terms, occupying his senatorial seat for 27 years all told. Wolcott was elected for and served two full terms of six years each. Thus it would appear that, so far, almost half of our senatorial representation has been by these two men.

It is no small distinction for Colorado to have come in as the Centennial State, and, as if in appreciation of the honor, the State soon assumed a position such as had not been known in Territorial days. Previous to admission our general officials were supplied from the outside, along with States' eggs and cove oysters. They were called "carpetbaggers," and were so unpopular that "carpetbagism" was the principal issue in politics. With statehood came improved industrial conditions and also officials bearing the home brand.

In Territorial days Jerome B. Chaffee long held leadership in the Republican Party. He fought the "carpetbaggers," was a Delegate in Congress, and labored in season and out for statehood. He was known as "Boss" Chaffee, but he was an easy and therefore a popular boss. So preeminent was his position in his party that when the first State election resulted in favor of the Republicans one of the two senatorships was conceded to him by unanimous consent.

There was no such unanimity regarding the second senatorship, at least on the surface. Mr. Teller's superior fitness for the office was generally recognized, but apparently there was one serious obstacle in his way. By common consent it had come to be the established view that the senatorships should be apportioned geographically, one going to a northern and the other to a southern man. Moreover, Teller was not an aggressive candidate. The result was that with the election of Chaffee, a northern Colorado man, determined in advance, a swarm of candidates for the second senatorship came up from the southern counties. Teller was not nominated until the second day of the Republican caucus. He was chosen then because none of the southern candidates could command a majority of the caucus—in other words, because he was preferred even by southern members.

The joint election occurred on the 14th day of November, 1876, and both Teller and Chaffee proceeded to Washington so as to be there at the opening of the session on the following first Monday in December. Their first duty was to participate in the usual lottery for the allotment of terms of office. In this drawing Teller drew a term of three months and Chaffee a term of two years. The shorter term was preferable because it insured reelection by the same legislature which had previously elected. Accordingly, Teller received his second election a very short time after his first. The second choice was for a full term of six years.

James B. Belford, known nationally as the "red-headed rooster of the Rockies," was elected by popular vote as the occupant of the only seat allotted the State in the National House of Representatives. Chaffee held a prominent place in National Republican politics, and Belford was one of the most popular speakers of his time. The delegation commanded general respect from the beginning.

When Mr. Teller first took his seat in the Senate General Grant was still President and the Civil War was only a little more than 10 years behind us. Problems connected with reconstruction and financial rehabilitation engaged the attention of legislators to the exclusion of almost all other subjects. Many of these questions were of a legal nature, rendering the Colorado Senator's experience as a lawyer useful from the beginning. The Hayes-Tilden presidential contest, growing out of the presidential election of 1876, came on almost simultaneously with Teller's entrance upon his duties in the Senate, and to the solution of the intricacies of that complicated and still poorly understood electoral tangle he contributed not a little. The silver question was beginning to attract attention, and he entered upon the study of finance, which throughout his career continued to be the subject of uppermost consideration by him. As a matter of fact, there was no preparatory course in public affairs for Teller, and from the first he took a position alongside such leaders as Conkling, Hoar, Edmunds, and Thurman, justifying even then the remark of a colored admirer that he was "one of the longded-headedest men in the Senate."

It was in the midst of Teller's first full term, 1882, when Gen. Chester A. Arthur became President through the assassination of President Garfield, that the Colorado Senator was called to a seat in the Cabinet as Secretary of the Interior. This office he filled for three years, and because of his legal attainments and his knowledge of western affairs he rendered such service as to cause one still to hear the remark among old-timers in Washington that he was the best Secretary the country ever had. It was while serving as Secretary, in January, 1885, that he was elected to the Senate for the third time.

In this instance Mr. Teller was chosen to succeed Mr. N. P. Hill, who six years before had displaced Mr. Chaffee. The original Hill election had not been free from contention and had resulted in the most serious schism which ever occurred in the ranks of the Republican Party in this State. This dissension took such shape that after Hill reached the Senate he and Teller were directly arrayed against each other, with Wolcott the principal backer of Hill, while Chaffee stood squarely behind Teller. That story is too long to rehearse here, but it is not out of place to say that it was in the contests of 1882 and 1884 that the factional fight reached its climax and that the fur was made to fly in good earnest. As a candidate for reelection Hill stood against the field, but his opponents could agree only on the one point of their opposition to him. No one of them could be brought to support any of the others, while all were more or less friendly to Teller. He had expressed a desire to retire from public life, but when it became evident that Hill could be beaten only by his entering the race, he went in, and was successful.

It is obviously out of the question to follow Senator Teller throughout his long term of years in Congress. He was ever one of the most constant attendants upon the sittings of that body, as he was one of the most active participants in its deliberations. He was punctilious in the performance of his committee duties, and Senator William B. Allison, so long chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, once told me, even after Teller had become a Democrat, that the Colorado Senator was one of his most valuable assistants in the work of that important agency of the Senate.

He was a constant participant in the Senate debates on all subjects, and he delivered many formal addresses as well. Never has the country produced a more careful student of public affairs than was Henry M. Teller, and woe betide the man who questioned his array of facts and precedents in debate. He liked nothing better than to pore half the night over a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and a new statistical abstract was a choice morsel for him. He prepared for his speeches as a lawyer might prepare for the trial of a great case in court. His colleagues understood his methods and always listened to his views as to those of a man who knew every foot of his ground. He resorted to no special ornamentation of speech. If he ever told a story or quoted a verse in the course of a public address, I do not recall the occasion. He always was too much occupied with the facts of his discourse to give much attention to mere ornateness. His effort was to convince rather than to fascinate. But, plain as was his manner, Mr. Teller still was a pleasing, logical, and forceful speaker, and when aroused he could be touchingly eloquent.

Beginning with his participation in the work of reconstruction, he followed such subjects as the currency, the tariff, foreign relations, and railroad and banking regulation with unremitting assiduity. The affairs of the Treasury Department appeared to be as familiar to him as his own household, and never a treaty with another country came up for consideration that he did not appear to know quite as much about it as its own authors. On all subjects pertaining to Colorado and the West generally, such as the disposition of the public lands, irrigation, and our relations with the Indians, he was perfectly at home and always to the front.

As the time went on the silver question became more and more acute as it became more and more evident that certain interests were determined to destroy the money use of the white metal. Our Senator was a rock-bound bimetallist and thundered against what he believed to be the rankest heresy of the time.

CUBAN RESOLUTION.

When the Spanish War with the succeeding Philippine revolution came on no public man gave more attention to it than did the Colorado Senator, and he did not cease to be interested when the fireworks were discontinued in the far-off Pacific islands. That was another day of reconstruction, and he realized that in the pride of conquest we as a Nation were liable to make the mistake of replacing the Spanish yoke with one of our own. He sought to avert this result.

Teller's labor in behalf of the Filipinos was not successful, for we still control the Philippines, although in a benignant way. He, however, accomplished more for Cuba, preventing the assumption of possible American suzerainty over that island, and for this act received more praise in the Senate in after years than I ever heard bestowed on any living Senator in almost 33 years of close attendance on that body.

His intervention in the Cuban matter came on the eve of our war with Spain, and took the shape of a declaration of our intention to refrain from all attempts at control of the insular country after peace should be established. This declaration was one of a series of congressional resolutions recognizing the independence of Cuba and demanding that Spain relinquish its authority in the island, virtually a declaration of war.

As reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, after making these demands, the resolutions empowered the President to employ the military forces of the United States for their enforcement. They made no reference, however, to the policy to be pursued after we should have driven the Spaniards out. Without some such declaration of intention we would have been free, as the dominating force, to pursue our own sweet will, and, judging from our course in Porto Rico and the Philippines, we would have set up and maintained permanently a United States Government there. That was not Mr. Teller's idea. He did not believe in a war of conquest. Consequently, he moved to amend the committee report by the addition of the following resolution:

"That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to its people."

The amendment was accepted by the Senate and thus became a part of our declaration of principles when we threw down the gage of battle to Spain.

It was a radical departure in diplomacy. It set up a new standard for nations, putting them, like men, on the Golden Rule footing. It served to keep other countries off our back while we were pommeling Spain, and if I mistake not, has had an impelling influence in fixing our policy in the more complicated war out of which we have recently emerged with signal honor to ourselves. It was a declaration of the right of a people to govern their own affairs—a distinct forerunner of the principle of race lines. Generally adopted as a basis of diplomacy, the policy here outlined would end all wars of aggression by removing the principal incentive and render leagues of nations and associations of nations matters of supererogation.

The importance of the adoption of the resolution was realized to an extent at the time, but to a far greater extent soon afterwards, when, after the close of the war, it came to dealing with affairs in the Philippines. It was on an occasion in 1902 when the Philippine question was up in the Senate that some Senator incidentally expressed the opinion that it might have been better for all concerned if the United States had adopted toward the Pacific islands the same policy which had been pursued toward Cuba. Then it was that an unprecedented stream of compliments was poured in upon the author of the resolution. By this time he had become a Democrat, and the occurrence was all the more significant, because the principal speakers were Republicans.

Senator Hoar, by common consent nestor of the Senate, led off by saying that he doubted "whether any man has sat in this Chamber since Charles Sumner died, or whether all who sit here now put together, have done a more important single service to the country than he [Teller] did in securing the passage of the resolution which pledged us to deal with Cuba according to the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

Senator Spooner, known in his day as the Senate's lawyer, expressed the opinion that "the adoption of the resolution had more to do than all other things in preventing a combination against us among the nations which held colonies."

Senator Hale, the most conservative man in the body, that "had it not been for the declaration standing before us as an outright and express pledge and agreement, Cuba would not be to-day a free and independent republic"; Senator Fairbanks, afterwards Vice President, that "the resolution was eminently wise and timely." Senator Cullom, then a Member and afterwards chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, expressed his opinion thus:

"I have always thought and believed that the amendment, while it seemed at the time to be somewhat questionable, would do, as it has done, more to keep this country from insisting upon the annexation of the island of Cuba, and also to keep other nations from insisting that we had some selfish purpose in our course in reference to it, than anything else that could have been done except the war itself."

STAND FOR SILVER.

But, however important may have been his service in other connections, it must be said that Teller's name was more conspicuously associated with the cause of bimetallism than with any other subject which came before Congress in his time. He believed in the parity of gold and silver on the old ratio of 16 to 1, with free coinage of silver as well as for gold. He thought such an arrangement in the interest of world welfare, but contended for its maintenance by the United States if impossible to bring the other great nations to this basis. For this principle he fought day after day, session after session, and he labored unceasingly to bring every possible influence to bear upon Congress and upon successive administrations to uphold it. He sought especially to have the great political parties declare for it. The Democratic Party was more favorably inclined than the Republican, but the Republicans gave qualified indorsement until the St. Louis convention in 1896, when that party made a positive declaration in favor of the gold standard. This was the hair which broke the camel's back. It was more than Teller could bear, and it caused him to desert the Republican Party and break politically with his colleague, Senator E. O. Wolcott.

I shall not attempt to speak of these occurrences except in the most general terms.

For years the Republican Party had been drifting toward the single gold standard. Both of our Senators saw the tendency and both did all in their power to hold the party in line for bimetallism. The Democratic Party was far more favorable. With Teller the free coinage of silver was a religion, and he let it be known that his political support would be given to those who most helped the cause that was so near his heart. Wolcott was greatly in earnest in support of the double standard, but with him the subject was not paramount.

Unquestionably the Republican leaders felt the seriousness of the situation, for they knew that a split meant not the loss of Colorado alone to their party but of all the silver-producing States, as well as of many Republican votes elsewhere. The pressure from financial centers was so strong, however, that the leaders were overcome by it, and as the time for the June conventions approached it became more and more evident that for the first time the Republicans in their national meeting would definitely desert the cause of silver, at least without the cooperation of other powers.

Colorado was up in arms over this prospect. Not only was this the principal silver-producing State of the Union, but a large majority of the people of the State had become bimetallists from conviction as a result of studying the question as an economic issue.

In this State the line of cleavage was the attitude of our two Senators. It soon became evident that the large majority were with Teller in his more pronounced stand. The State convention to select delegates to the Republican National Convention to be held in St. Louis confirmed this view with a unanimity that was startling. Teller was named as chairman of the Colorado delegation and was given associates whose instructions were to follow the senior Senator in whatever course he might elect to pursue at St. Louis. Wolcott's plea for a more conservative course received no consideration whatever.

Then came the convention at St. Louis, Teller's pleading with the committee on resolutions, his last effort in the convention itself, and when both prayers proved unavailing, the grand finale, the walkout. I was there and saw the entire performance, and I want to say that it was the most impressive spectacle I ever witnessed. It was equally dramatic and pathetic. About two dozen delegates trailed out behind the Colorado Senator, grown 10 years older overnight, as he walked slowly from the platform, through the long center aisle of the hall, to the front door of the convention, which shut on him forever after more than 40 years of service in the party. There were many moist eyes. To Mr. Teller the ordeal was especially trying. He had helped to organize the party, had supported it in all its campaigns, had sustained it as the champion of human rights throughout Civil War days, had contracted within its ranks the tenderest friendships.

There were few tears among the bolters, but their faces were stern and drawn. Their departure was orderly and dignified.

After this spectacle came the nomination of McKinley by the Republicans on a gold plank with a promise of effort to obtain international cooperation in favor of bimetallism; the formation of the Silver Republican Party, which put Teller up for President; the nomination of Bryan by the Democrats on a silver platform; the withdrawal of Teller from the presidential race in favor of Bryan; the Bryan campaign, and Bryan's defeat.

Such, in brief, is the story of the failure of silver to regain its footing as a money metal. Such also is the story of the political effect of the failure and of Mr. Teller's severance of all ties with the Republican Party in which he had been prominent many, many years. That this parting caused him much pain there can be no doubt, but it can not be said that he ever regretted it. He found himself in accord with the Democrats on many lines of policy, and he was ever ready to resent anything like taunt on account of his course and to defend his attitude whenever attacked. One instance will suffice in this connection. Senators, generally, respected his position, but there was one occasion, just before the St. Louis convention, when one of his oldest Republican colleagues challenged his good faith. I have not access to the records, but I have a newspaper quotation from his remarks in reply from which I make the following excerpt:

"I have been a Republican as long as the Senator," he said, pointing his finger at the offender, "and I love the Republican Party as devotedly as he. When he became a Republican he abandoned a bankrupt party—already dead—while I left a party triumphant from ocean to ocean and in power in every branch of the Government. It was easy then for a man to cease to be a Whig and become a Republican. That is what the Senator did. It was difficult for a man to leave the victorious Democracy. That is what I did. I am again confronted with that condition, and what I did in 1854 I can do again in 1896. It was painful then; it is and will be painful now, but the path of duty is ever the thorny one."

There is much of interesting personal and political detail to the parting of the ways for the Colorado Senators growing out of the silver situation. Wolcott could not see his way clear to desert his party. He accepted at its face value the Republican promise of effort to promote international action and elected to stand with the old party, even in the face of its unpopularity in Colorado. The one-sided campaign of 1896 followed.

Wolcott was hooted and jeered wherever he appeared at a meeting in his own State. Teller received such a welcome on his return to Denver after St. Louis as seldom has been given to any man. Enthusiastic admirers insisted upon drawing his carriage from the station to his hotel, in the vicinity of which it was estimated there were fully 100,000 people congregated. He surely was the idol of his people.

Mr. Teller was almost unanimously reelected to the Senate in 1897 and was again reelected in 1903. In the latter contest, however, he had Wolcott for an opponent. The younger man had regained much of his popularity and his party was again largely in favor. The result was the closest fight that Teller ever had. It also was his final political struggle. He retired with the close of his term in 1909, having given his State and his country as faithful service for a third of a century as ever was rendered by mortal man to any State or any country.

In thus closing the record of such a remarkable political career, it is pleasant to be able to note that, notwithstanding his change of front, Mr. Teller did not lose an iota of his influence in the Senate, continuing to be personally as highly regarded even among Republicans as he had been when affiliating with them. Excellent corroboration of this statement is found in the fact that for some years after he left the Senate he remained as a member of the Monetary Commission upon the especial request of its chairman, Hon. Nelson W. Aldrich, who was the Republican leader in the Senate.

In his quiet but masterful manner Teller dominated politics in Colorado for a third of a century. During that period he made and unmade several parties and few men were elected to important positions without the stamp of his approval. No man in politics ever had more loyal or devoted followers, a fact which is all the more remarkable in view of the circumstance that all served him without hope of reward. Whenever election time approached in his various campaigns there were volunteers in advance in far greater numbers than were necessary to insure his success. He did not have to solicit votes; the voters came voluntarily to his support. Regardless of the name of the party whose banner he followed there never was a time when the "Teller men" did not outnumber the opposition forces.

This situation was due to the man's personal popularity. He had no machine. For that matter he had no need of one. A vast supporting system would have been most distasteful to him. It would have taken more time than he would have wanted to give to it. The simple truth is that he served the State so efficiently and whole-heartedly that the voters demanded his election whenever he came before them. He knew the people of Colorado as no other man ever has known them and they never failed to respond to any call made upon them in his behalf. He depended upon them and never was disappointed. He never went into a fight that he did not win. Not regarded as a "practical" politician in the usual sense, he still was one of the shrewdest of all political leaders.

AS SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Concerning Mr. Teller's administration of the affairs of the Interior Department comparatively little will be said. He served through the three-year term of President Arthur, beginning in 1882 and ending in 1885, and it is universally admitted that his service was preeminently satisfactory, as was to be expected in view of his knowledge of western affairs, his legal attainments, and his general level-headedness. He was a steadfast admirer of General Arthur and he enjoyed his experience in the Cabinet, although he did not seek the office. Mr. Teller has left in a newspaper interview a brief account of his call to that service, as follows:

"On May 6, 1882, I entered President Arthur's Cabinet as Secretary of the Interior. President Garfield was shot in 1881. That was a very pathetic tragedy and one that affected me deeply. He was a most lovable man. I did not want to become Secretary. President Arthur asked me to suggest a man. I suggested my colleague, Senator Chaffee. The President, who always stayed up nearly all night, called me to the White House one night about 10 o'clock. He completely surprised me by asking me to accept the position. I explained that it was a politically unwise move and a most ungrateful task, and that I didn't care to assume the responsibility and burden. In fact, I flatly refused, but after receiving hundreds of telegrams from Colorado urging me to accept I did so."

As Secretary he gave much attention to the education of the Indians and for his service in this connection acquired the friendship of many leaders among the red men throughout the country. From a long and complimentary article in the Washington Tomahawk, an organ of the race, I extract the following:

"Some very important issues, involving questions of interest to the poor as well as to the rich man, have been decided wisely and fairly. People can fully and sincerely appreciate this state of affairs and thank God for western business tact in the Interior Department under the management of the Hon. Henry M. Teller. Decision is what we want in this active age of American progress. A few more business men like him in the Government who give you an honest yes or no, and you go away, feeling certain that the answer you received is a truthful one, are needed. No red tape or buncombe surrounds the office of the present Secretary of the Interior. Its head understands and has regard for other peoples' rights and decides accordingly."

In expressions quoted elsewhere a number of contemporary western Senators praise Mr. Teller's administration of the affairs of the department, while Judge Wilbur F. Stone says that "This administration was marked by uniform ability and the accomplishment of many needed reforms of especial benefit to the far West."

A newspaper clipping of the day preserves a characteristic incident of Mr. Teller's incumbency of the office of Secretary, as follows:

"One of the big southern railroads was clamoring for patent rights to several thousand acres of land which the company claimed it had earned. Attorney General Brewster had O. K'd their claim and it was up to the Secretary of the Interior to give the final word in favor of the railroad. An agent from the company visited the Secretary, and after a long rambling talk he finally suggested that the Secretary needed a rest and if he would take such a rest and leave matters in charge of a subordinate it would be worth, say, $250,000 to Teller. The visiting agent made an unexpected exit out of the door and several weeks later Secretary Teller handed down a decision, based on a most careful and elaborate investigation of the improvements claimed to have been made by the railroad, against the company."

In the main he preferred the Senate to the Cabinet and his preference was gratified by his return to the Capitol on the day that he left the Interior Department.

BUSINESS RELATIONS.

I wish that space permitted me to dwell in detail upon Mr. Teller's professional career, but that is out of the question. It must suffice to say that he was devoted to his calling, that he was successful in it above all of his rivals, and that he held aloft the highest standard of professional ethics. He held first rank as a lawyer from the beginning to the end of his life in Colorado.

Nor is there a possibility of going into his business affairs to any extent. During his life he had two outstanding opportunities to become very wealthy.

In the very early days of Denver the gentleman who laid out Clement's Addition, containing 160 acres on what is now known as Capitol Hill, finding himself in financial distress importuned Teller to purchase the entire property, offering it to him for $800. "I thought well of the proposition," said Mr. Teller in relating the incident, "but I was just getting into my buggy to go from Denver to my home in Central City and asked him to wait until I came down again. When I returned Clements raised his price to $1,200. I was disgusted and refused to further consider the matter." The land is now worth millions.

When Leadville was beginning to attract attention, Irving Howbert and Benjamin Crowell, both of Colorado Springs and both devoted friends of Senator Teller, obtained an option to purchase the Robert E. Lee mine for $200,000. They invited Teller to join them as an equal partner, and when he declined on the ground of a lack of funds they offered to put up his share of the money and wait upon him until the mine itself should reimburse them. Again, however, he refused, this time because he did not desire to assume so great a responsibility. There were times afterwards when the net output of the mine for a single week more than equaled the purchase price. It was one of the great bonanzas of the Carbonate Camp, and for a time was regarded as the richest of the lot.

Teller was not, however, a poor man. He made a great deal of money in the practice of his profession and became the owner of much property. He left a considerable estate when he died, and it would have been much larger if he had not been a liberal indorser of other people's notes of hand.

CHURCH AND MASONRY.

Mr. Teller was both a Mason and a Methodist.

As a Mason he attained to the thirty-third degree and was a member of the Scottish Rite, southern jurisdiction. In that work, as in all others, he was a leader, and he held high office in the order. For seven years he occupied the position of grand master of the Masonic Order in Colorado, and he also was the first grand commander of the Knights Templar of this State.

When he retired from the Senate in 1909 he was given a farewell reception which was attended by practically all of the prominent Masons of Washington. In addition to printing a long list of names of those in attendance, the Washington Star of March 13 of that year gave a full account of the function, in part, as follows:

"Masonic brothers of Sovereign Grand Inspector Henry M. Teller, who completed nearly 30 years of service as Senator from Colorado March 4, tendered him an exceptional token of respect and esteem last night at the house of the temple, Third and E Streets NW. The supreme council, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite Masons, threw open the doors. More than 500 Masons and ladies took the opportunity to express their regret that Senator Teller would no longer be in Washington.

"The veteran Senator, who has represented his State in the upper branch of Congress ever since it was admitted to the Union, with the exception of three years when he served as Secretary of the Interior under President Arthur, was all smiles. It was easy to see that the kind words of his friends and the honor they were paying him touched him deeply and warmed his heart. The Colorado consistory had sent a huge floral offering which was presented to Senator Teller. During the evening thirty-second and thirty-third degree Masons, representing all sections of the country, dropped in to shake hands with him."

On the reception committee were fully a dozen brother Masons from the Senate as well as many other distinguished members of the thirty-third degree.

While Senator Teller did not attach himself to any church permanently until late in life, when he joined the Methodist Church, he had affiliated with that body practically from boyhood and was regarded as a religious man. Fortunately we have from the lips of Dr. B. T. Vincent, who had been the Senator's pastor and intimate friend, an authentic outline of the Senator's church relation. It was given as a part of the doctor's funeral sermon as delivered in Denver on the 26th of February, 1914. In the course of his address Doctor Vincent said:

"Of Senator Teller's religious life I am able to speak intelligently and freely. My first acquaintance with him and his family was in connection with my appointment as pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Central City in 1863. The friendship begun then with Mr. and Mrs. Teller has been a growing charm to my life ever since. I found his heart; and I found it warm without gush, and trustworthy without boast. He was deeply concerned in all the interests of the church, grounded in his profound interest in Christianity. Mrs. Teller's faithful, active, and useful devotion to the church made in his tender domestic affections a strong tie to the work. And as his children came, the lives of all of whom I have lovingly known from their birth, his eagerness to have them intelligently identified with the church of his own childhood was marked.

"As with his legal, commercial, and political life so in his religious life, Mr. Teller performed rather than professed. As an official member of the church he was interested and liberal. The general church, the University of Denver, and all other good institutions felt the force of his effective cooperation.

That he was a religious man, without a public profession of it, is conceded by those who knew him most intimately. He had no surface sentimentality; but when issues came before him demanding decision between the right and the wrong he never hesitated. As he habitually turned his glass upside down at tables where drinking was indulged, so he stood by that great reform and all like issues when the good of men and society was concerned. This is not to be wondered at because he was brought up in a religious home, lived after his marriage with a godly wife, all unto conviction of the truth of the Holy Scriptures and the verities of the Christian religion. By these verities he stood firmly, always defending them when necessary and practically living by them.

"As to the emotional aspects of religion, his temperament restrained him. The death of his son-in-law, Doctor Tyler—a man of rare Christian worth, dearly loved by the Senator as a son—awakened his soul unto a depth of feeling apparently unknown to himself before. That event aroused and brought to the surface all the early religious sentiments that had been latent since his childhood, moving him to a noble public confession of his faith in Christ, and in his sense of responsibility to make a public confession of Christ and unite with the visible church unto glad conformity to its requirements.

"His ardent interest in Free Masonry was not in the mistaken notion that Masonry was a substitute for religion, but in recognition of all that was religious in its traditions and ceremonies as contributive to true religious faith, experience, and practice. When in 1868 he, as grand master, asked me to deliver the annual oration before the grand lodge of Colorado, and in my address I emphasized the obligation of a Mason, whether Moslem, Jew, or Christian, to try to teach the highest standard of character provided for by his religion toward an advancement even beyond it, Mr. Teller pronounced his emphatic approval of the position."

TRIBUTES.

Such, in brief, is the record of the man; but I am not content to leave the subject without some effort to present the reasons for his success in life and his hold upon his friends and followers—in other words, to outline some of his traits of character. For almost a quarter of a century I came into practically daily contact with Mr. Teller, and I feel that my testimony should be given in the interest of history.

In entering upon this agreeable task I am moved to speak first of his modesty as one of his chief virtues. He never put self to the front in anything that he did and he always seemed absolutely indifferent to adulation—more so, indeed, than any man I have ever known in public life, and I have known a great many. He did not seek newspaper notoriety and he made no parade of achievements which really should have been known. I have known him to be made the subject of most flattering eulogy while present in the Senate, where the praise was being bestowed, without appearing in the least moved. Once when an advertising man sought to obtain his patronage of a work, simply because he was to be written about, he declined, saying to me after the gentleman had departed, "It is not the things they say you do, but the things you do that count."

But prominent as was this characteristic of modesty, I do not consider it the most noteworthy of his many admirable personal qualities. It, however, set off and supplemented the others most becomingly. If pressed to name the most conspicuous of these characteristics, I think I should say that aside from his mental alertness, it was his love of justice, with all that it involved, including his general desire to benefit mankind, to assist the oppressed and distressed, to encourage those who were struggling against odds—to promote fair play generally. To this end he was tolerant of faults, charitable to the weak and poor, and generous to everyone. He always wanted to help the under dog, and he believed that in doing so he was assisting all. To my mind this trait was the key to his character and could be made to explain every action of his life, public as well as private. Probably it would be proper to say that his sympathy went out to the distressed and indigent if they were worthy, but I have seen him act in many cases in which he had to stretch the doubt mightily.

As a specimen of his love of fair play, it is related that one of his first acts after reaching Denver was the hauling down with his own hands of a Confederate flag which had been hoisted here by some southern sympathizers. On the other hand, when a mob set out to lynch a miner in Central City because he had expressed exultation over the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, Mr. Teller saved the fellow's neck at the risk of his own life. He was the first citizen of the Territory to offer to raise troops for the suppression of the rebellion.

His charity to the penniless was unceasing. Senators do not now receive munificent salaries, but in his time the compensation was considerably less than at present. He had no large private income and he generally was in debt; but, notwithstanding these obstacles to open-handedness, he always was giving money away. In addition to numerous casual "customers," he had a regular string of retainers who drew heavily and constantly upon him—persons who, in most cases, had no claim except that of common humanity. More times than I can tell you of I have had him come to me for the loan of five or ten dollars which I knew he wanted to give to this person or that who had followed him into the Capitol. If I had the money, I always gave it to him as a matter of course, but often with a word of caution against too reckless liberality where there was no chance for return. I do not recall that he ever made any response to such exhortations, indicating that while he appreciated the great wisdom of my advice, he still saw no way but to help the needy. He didn't even say that he wanted the money for the waiting man or woman, and when it was handed to him would turn away and pass it on more or less surreptitiously to avoid embarrassment to the recipient. These dependents were on his heels in Denver as well as in Washington. Many a down-and-out miner or old-timer has been saved from immediate distress by the generosity of "H. M.," as they called him.

But Mr. Teller's charity was not expressed in dollars and cents alone. Before Congress there are always many people with grievances, with claims for money long overdue, with wrongs to be righted on account of the acts of government officials, with injustices on account of demotions or dismissals from service, to be righted. Such as these never failed to seek out the Colorado Senator. To all such his sympathetic nature and kindness of heart were known in the beginning or soon discovered. They never failed of considerate response, nor of help if investigation satisfied him of the merits of the case. Sometimes it was possible to procure speedy relief; much oftener help came slowly, for Uncle Sam is proverbially a slow paymaster. But delays made no difference so far as Mr. Teller's assistance was concerned. Once convinced of the justice of a claim, he would go on helping year after year if necessary to bring relief.

Doubtless there are living some who have heard of the McGarrahan case, for it was famous for several decades. William McGarrahan, a traveled and educated man, had come into possession of a quicksilver mine in California in the early days of that State's history, but a corporation had discovered a flaw in his title and had taken unceremonious possession of his property. The mine was believed to be worth millions, but without it McGarrahan was poor indeed. Like so many others, he found Teller's soft side early in the latter's senatorial career and lost no time in enlisting his assistance. Without any promise or expectations of personal reward, he gave the claim the same careful consideration as he would have given it if employed as legal counsel, and went on doing so for years, perhaps 20, using every resource at his command to get the relief bill passed. But there were powerful influences to be overcome, and only once did the measure succeed in getting through both Houses of Congress, and only then to be vetoed by the President. Soon after this decisive blow, McGarrahan died, a broken-hearted old man, and when he died Mr. Teller was one of the few mourners at his bier.

This is only a specimen of many similar instances. And it was not with time and money alone that he was generous. His consideration of others found many other forms of expression. Any sort of distress or embarrassment appealed to him. I can illustrate by relating some personal experiences, if you will permit me to do so. No more fitting instance is afforded than one connected with my first meeting with him.

I came to Colorado during the summer of 1876 to take a position on the Denver Tribune, then a prominent morning paper. I was young, inexperienced, and timid. Soon after my arrival Gen. William T. Sherman came in unannounced. He was accompanied by a formidable party of notables from Europe to whom he was host and guide. It became my duty to ascertain who they were and what was the purpose of their visit. They were staying at the American House, then one of Denver's two leading hotels, and thither I repaired on my mission. I found the general busy in his room exhibiting a large map to his companions and therefore too much occupied to give me any particulars. Indeed, he was rather curt, and I retreated to a place near the door quite disconcerted and greatly discouraged. I did not know where to turn if I could not get information from the head of the party. As it developed, there were several local men of prominence present, but these were as unknown to me as the visitors. It was from this portion of the group that relief came. A gentleman of quiet manners, who wore neither shoulder straps nor decorations, discovered my plight and divined my difficulties. He crossed the room to where I stood, introduced himself as Mr. Teller, told me the party were on their way to northwestern Colorado on a hunt for big game, and that General Sherman was explaining the topography of the region to them. He gave me names and such general information as was necessary to prepare a comprehensive account of the distinguished party—just what I wanted and felt I must have.

That is the story. A little thing, you say. By no means! Such an action must be measured by the relief it brings. It must be gauged from the recipient's point of view to be properly appreciated. To me it was most important. It saved me from being "scooped" and humiliated. Nor was it a small thing from any point of view. The significance of it for present purposes is found in the intuition and willingness to aid and comfort on the part of our subject. Moreover, the incident had far-reaching consequences. It made of me a "Teller man," and when, later, the State split into political factions I threw what little influence I possessed to him, so impressing him that 10 years after the meeting at the American House I went to Washington as his private secretary.

If I had formed a high opinion in the beginning, my estimation increased as the years went by, as I am going to show, at the risk of being accused of indelicacy, by quoting from a letter I wrote in 1887 from Washington detailing to a friend in Denver my duties and experiences there. In this letter, which has been preserved all these years, I said:

"I want to tell you about a debate in the Senate yesterday in which I was much interested. The discussion related to a bill to prohibit United States Senators from acting as attorneys for railroads likely to have lawsuits with the Government. There was a great deal of personal feeling manifested and some sharp language used—by long odds the most spirited, if not the most interesting, debate I have heard. Senator Beck had introduced the bill and made a fight for it, and in doing so criticized the Senate so sharply that many Senators resented what he said. Teller made the most fiery speech I ever heard from him, and a good speech, too.

"I tell you I am beginning to feel proud of my Senator. He is certainly one of the most level-headed men and one of the best debaters in the entire body, and is so recognized here in the Senate and out. There has hardly been a time during the last 10 days that he has not taken a leading part in the proceedings, talking on all conceivable subjects and always in a way to command attention. Not only has he good judgment but his information concerning the affairs of the country is wonderfully varied and markedly accurate. All the Senators consult him, and he is very popular with them—the biggest of them.

"More than this, he is the same with Senators that he is with everybody else. He cut Senator Evarts short in a conversation to talk with me about some letters. He is never "stuck up"—always the same. He does not treat me as other Senators do their secretaries. Most of them keep their men waiting upon them and running after them and dictate all their letters to them, even to 'My dear sir' and 'Yours respectfully.' Teller says, 'Here, Tom, take these letters and answer them.' Often he signs the letters without reading, correcting them rarely, and then only because of some error in the statement of facts. He never seems to care whether I work or play. One morning I slept late and did not get to the Capitol until 10. I apologized. He said, 'That's all right; sleep all you can.' I tell you my admiration for the man has increased rather than diminished."

But this estimate was written only after I had known Mr. Teller for 10 years and had been associated with him for only 6 weeks. It has now been more than 46 years since I became acquainted with him; and I want to say that after those 46 years, and after my intimate association in office with him for 23 years, my admiration fails to abate.

In his office, as elsewhere, he was always thoughtful, reasonable, patient, forbearing, good-natured, agreeable, and often even mirthful. All this without flurry or pretense or ostentation, without an effort to make the recipient of the kindness feel that he had been kind. Indeed, he never seemed to take any thought of the consideration shown to others in his office or out. He often seemed most indifferent to the thanks of beneficiaries, so indifferent, indeed, as to create the impression that he was cold. But if he was indulgent to his helpers, he was not on that account indifferent to the kind of work performed. They could do their duties almost in their own time and in their own way, but they must do them. For them to have been careless would have been to neglect another class very near to his heart, and that was his constituents, the people of Colorado. They wrote freely and often, asking many favors of him. To all such letters as required personal attention he gave it, and if he turned a letter over to a subordinate for attention he expected the subordinate to give the same consideration that he would have given. Every letter must have a response, regardless of the rank or standing of its author, and every effort must be made to serve the writer. The people of the State were very close to his heart. He never faltered in his efforts to serve them, either in the mass or as individuals. That they appreciated his efforts and reciprocated his regard is shown by the fact that they kept him in high position in public life for 33 years, only allowing him to retire when he insisted upon doing so.

In what I have said concerning Mr. Teller's interest in the unfortunate and distressed I have not meant to intimate that he was prejudiced against the well-to-do. By no means. No man ever had a more profound respect for the rights of property and none more sincere friends among people of wealth. He believed every man to be entitled to, and protected in, the enjoyment of what he had honestly earned. But he wanted all to have an equal chance, and he did not consider that the possession of wealth should be allowed to confer especial privileges or insure particular preferment. He appreciated the handicaps of the indigent and the unfortunate, and favored the policy of giving them another chance for an even start.

As going to show his attitude, I should like to relate that on one occasion when the appointment of a surveyor general for Colorado rested with him he refused to give the office to a wealthy friend who desired the place merely for the honor of holding it. He deprecated especially the election of men to the Senate merely because of their possession of wealth. On one occasion when there was a hot senatorial campaign on in Colorado in which Teller was not a candidate, his assistance was sought by an aspirant of large means but of limited education and meager information about national affairs. "Teller, you can elect me to the Senate if you will, and I think I ought to have your help because of what I have done for the State," said the man, bursting in abruptly upon the Senator.

Frankness was another of Teller's virtues. He did not keep his visitor in suspense. "You are mistaken in supposing that I could elect you. I could not do so if I wished, and I would not if I could," he replied. "Not because I do not like you and do not appreciate the use you have made of your money in the interest of the State, but because I know that you are not fitted by education, temperament, or general personal equipment for that office." When, however, the man became the victim of financial reverses, Teller was among the first to extend a helping hand.

As I have said, it is my opinion that Mr. Teller's sympathy with struggling humanity supplies the key to an understanding of his public life. He cared for men in the mass as well as singly. Take him in politics. As we have seen, in his young manhood a Democrat, he became a Republican upon the organization of the Republican Party because the Republicans promised freedom to the slaves, with which object he was in hearty accord. After remaining in the Republican ranks for 40 years he went back into the Democratic Party because it was more friendly to the coinage of silver than the Republican Party and because he believed the use of silver as money to be in the interest of the masses. However, he remained a protectionist in theory after he became a Democrat; he believed protection to be beneficial to the American laborer. Similar reasons could be found for all of his broader public acts. His constant desire was to give the poor fellow a chance. With Abou Ben Adhem he loved his fellow men. Speaking of Mr. Teller, Senator Wolcott once said to me: "H. M. carries the grief of the world on his shoulders." In a way he did, but he was not downcast in doing so. He was ever cheerful, as well as good-natured.

It would be too much to say that I agreed with Mr. Teller invariably, or that I approved everything he did throughout the long period of his public career, but I will say that when I differed from him I generally found in the end that his judgment had been better than mine. I want also to add that in the 33 years of my relationship with him I never saw him do a petty act or heard him express an unworthy thought. He did not use profanity; he did not tell risque stories. He never took a drink of intoxicating liquor, and he eschewed tobacco in all its forms. And all this without cant or moralizing.

In his time the eighteenth amendment was nonexistent and VOLSTEAD was unknown. He had many staunch friends who were steady drinkers. He tolerated them all and thought highly of some of them. To many of them he gave money to buy the bread which might have been theirs if their habits had been different.

He was a Mason of long standing, and not only did he "profess" Masonry but he lived up to the highest traditions of the order.

He was patriotic to the core, loving his State and his country passionately and serving them faithfully and effectively throughout a well-extended life. He loved nature, appreciated literature and art, knew several languages, and had high respect for all things which men hold sacred. He was passionately fond of trees and flowers, and it was an education in practical botany to be with him in the woods. He knew the child nature and regarded all children as in a way the wards of all grown-ups. The calling of the teacher he regarded as sacred, and he liked especially to reminisce about his own pedagogic days. I could go on enumerating, but it is sufficient to say that his life was exceptionally rounded. He was true in all relations, whether as public servant, husband, father, benefactor, employer, friend.

I appreciate that what I have said may appear to some—to the unknowing—more like eulogy than biography, but I have expressed my honest appreciation of a good man. And I am not alone in what I have said. Mr. Clarence G. Northup, of Denver, who was associated with me for many years in the clerical work for Mr. Teller and his committees, joins me in my estimate of the Senator, and adds that "too much can not be said."

Moreover, there is abundant outside testimony to support what Mr. Northup and I freely admit might be construed as prejudiced personal opinion, as coming from us. From the time he first entered upon his public career the Colorado Senator was the subject of much attention from both public and press, some of it, of course, not entirely complimentary. There was, however, much that was laudatory. Every time he was returned to the Senate he was complimented generally, and when he retired from that body in 1909 and after he passed away in 1914 the papers from one end of the country to the other spoke only in terms of praise, and we shall see a little further along how highly he was regarded by Lord Salisbury, one of the ablest of Great Britain's Prime Ministers.

Many years ago a well-known writer paid the following tribute to Mr. Teller: "He has this mark of genuine greatness above any man whom I know in Colorado or perhaps any that I have personally known anywhere in public life. He is simple, natural, without affectation. He is simple because it is natural for him to be simple, and simplicity indicates the calm mind and clear vision as to the relations of things—their real value. It seems to me that the holy spirit of patriotism has descended upon Teller and enveloped him and entered into his soul and sanctified his purposes. He stands before the country as the tongue of Colorado; but he speaks not for Colorado alone, not alone for the United States, but for the humbler three-fourths of all humanity. Soberly, bravely, and ably he is fighting humanity's holy cause for us and for all."

RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE.

To quote many of the expressions of 1909 when Mr. Teller was succeeded by Charles J. Hughes, jr., through the action and by the choice of Teller, would be to indulge in a great deal of repetition. Two examples must suffice, and I choose from editorials from the New York Sun and the Chicago Post, the former dated January 22, 1909, and the latter January 21 of the same year. The Sun said:

"We wish well to Mr. Hughes, but his coming upon the Washington stage means the departure from the Senate of a familiar and a strong figure. With the exception of his nearly three years of service as Secretary of the Interior in Mr. Arthur's Cabinet, the Hon. Henry Moore Teller has been a Senator since 1876. Apart from his silver heresy, which he shared with the people of his State and which he defended with a knowledge and skill remote from the vague and sentimental yammering of so many silver advocates, he has been and remains substantially a Republican; and his long experience, his familiarity with precedents, his clearness of intellect and practical grasp of the principles and details of legislation, especially as it affects the West, have made him one of the wisest and most valuable of Senators. He sat a generation ago with men like Blaine, Morton, Edmunds, Morrill, Conkling, John Sherman, Allison, Ingalls, Simon Cameron, Bayard. His term runs from toward the end of Grant's administration to the beginning of Taft's. He has seen many mutations of policy and fame, sudden heroes, and obscurities almost as sudden. He is of the class in which the Senate has never been wanting; the men of long heads, of courage, of thoughtfulness, of training in affairs."

The Post article was of greater length, and I extract the following passages:

"During one-third of a century Mr. Teller, to a greater or lesser extent, has been continuously before the eyes of the Nation. For a large part of that time he held high rank in the councils of his party. Few abler men have come out of the West and none longer held the affections of his people. Yet, when the final summary was made up, the only mention he received was that his name was among those entered.

"Mr. Teller's entry into the Senate was coincident with the entry of his State into the Union. His record is unique in that he served in that body 18 years as a Republican, and then, without missing a day, he served 12 years more as an Independent and a Democrat. A few other men have been elected to the Senate at different times by political parties of opposite beliefs, but a period intervened in which they waited for the people to experience a change. Mr. Teller repudiated his old affiliations and took up with the new without interruptions in his service.

"Since Colorado has been a State, one half of its representation in the United States Senate, except for three years, has been Henry M. Teller. The other half varied, as one term followed another, and the ability and character of that representation likewise varied.

"The home of many men suddenly made rich, Colorado found its honors placed on a cash basis and a Senate seat the chief price on the mart. One millionaire followed another for a short sojourn in the glamour of Washington life, but if any of them ever made an attempt to displace Mr. Teller the contest was not of sufficient importance to be recorded in political annals.

"While the newly rich and ofttimes unfitted were struggling among themselves for the second senatorship, Mr. Teller, a man of moderate means and of great abilities, continued to return honor to the State which had given honor to him. His colleague frequently was far from being considered a credit to his State, and at times figured in scandal, but through it all Mr. Teller kept his own record clean and his character unsullied.

"Thus, when almost 80 years old, respected throughout the land, revered by those who knew him well, Mr. Teller gives back the trust which Colorado placed in his keeping, and he doubtless feels he truly can say, 'I have made the fight; I have kept the faith.'"

A short time previous to Mr. Teller's retirement from the Senate a church newspaper sought expressions from the Senator's colleagues and from certain officers of the Senate with the end in view, it was stated, of emphasizing Mr. Teller's example to young men. The result was that more replies were received than can be printed here.

Vice President Charles W. Fairbanks, Republican, responded as follows:

"The Hon. Henry M. Teller, who retires from the United States Senate on the 4th of March, has played a conspicuous part in the political history of his day and generation. It has been my pleasure to be intimately associated with him for 12 years. I have observed the unflagging zeal and high order of ability with which he has devoted himself to the public service. No one has been more constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the Senate, or more intelligently watchful of the progress of important legislation through the Senate. He has been diligent, earnest, and effective in his service upon the committees where the really important work of legislation is fashioned. Senator Teller's name deserves to stand high among the statesmen of the last third of a century. He has brought to his high duties not only ability but a spirit of complete consecration to duty worthy of future emulation. Men may differ with some of his political views, but there can be no difference of opinion as to his exalted purpose or his great usefulness during the long period through which he has been conspicuous in public life."

Dr. Edward Everett Hale, author of The Man Without a Country and other literary productions, and at that time Chaplain of the Senate, said in what probably was the last article written by him:

"I wish I could in any way represent to you and to the young men of Colorado, whom you are addressing, an adequate sense of the respect with which everyone here regards Senator Teller. Every Member of the Senate whom I have heard speak of him expresses regret that he is to leave us. And when I say every Member I mean a great many Senators from all parts of the country. And this is not simply respect for a well-informed man, or a man of large experience. Everyone speaks of him as a man whom he is glad to know, a man with whom everyone is glad to be intimate. 'He is such a thoroughly good man.' 'He is always so true and right, you know.' He never gave up to party what was meant for mankind. It is a great blessing to the country to have such men in the highest stations, as we have had him."

Other Senators expressed themselves as follows:

Eugene Hale, Republican, of Maine: "It would be difficult for me to express my very high estimation of the character and public service of Senator Teller and my deep regret that he is about to retire from the Senate. He will be greatly missed by all his associates, and I think that there is but one feeling here, and that is of affectionate regard for him. It will be a long time before any other Senator can be found who can take his place as a legislator and statesman. I think I may say that he goes out of the Senate carrying with him the respect and affection of all of us."

HENRY CABOT LODGE, Republican, of Massachusetts: "I have served with Senator Teller for 16 years, and I not only feel for him a strong friendship but I have a sincere admiration for his high qualities as a public man. His retirement from the Senate is not only a public loss but a personal one to me. His long and distinguished service has been an honor to his State and to the country."

Benjamin R. Tillman, Democrat, of South Carolina: "Senator Teller will be missed from the Senate as much, perhaps, as any other man among us. He fills a peculiar niche and is recognized as the embodiment of honesty, high moral purpose, and sincerity. In my 14 years' association with him I have frequently had occasion to admire his manliness and intense Americanism or patriotism. We are not likely to look upon his like soon again, for he belongs to a type that is fast passing away. More's the pity."

LEE S. OVERMAN, Democrat, of North Carolina: "He is not only one of the best-informed men of the country upon all public matters but to-day he is one of the most industrious and hard-working Senators of this great body of men. His life has been clean, and it is to his great credit that while attending to all his public duties he does not neglect his spiritual duties, and it is rarely ever you miss him on Sunday morning in his seat in the Methodist Church, of which he is a devoted member."

Joseph B. Foraker, Republican, of Ohio: "I have been personally acquainted with Senator Teller for many years. I have known him intimately. I have seen him and been associated with him under circumstances that brought out his ability and his qualities as a man, a citizen, and a public official. The net result of all his acquaintance, friendship, and colabor is the highest admiration coupled with a regard as nearly affectionate as one man can have for another. His life and public career should be an inspiration to all his countrymen, especially to young men ambitious to serve the Nation. His retirement involves a great loss to the Senate."

Chauncey M. Depew, Republican, of New York: "His rare natural gifts have been supplemented by the closest study of questions relating to the welfare and development of the country since he entered the Senate in 1876. In these 32 years we have passed through many crises, industrial and financial, creating problems which required the best talent and greatest experience to solve. Senator Teller's contributions to wise legislation and the preventing of unwise during this long period have been of invaluable benefit to the people. He is, in the Senate, an encyclopedia of that information so useful in legislation which is not to be found in the books but is absorbed with long contact with subjects which after intervals come again to the front. While a partisan, his fairness and judicial consideration of all matters has given him great weight in the Senate. He has held the State of Colorado in the front rank for years in this great deliberative body."

Shelby M. Cullom, Republican, Illinois: "I have known Senator Teller for many years, and since the death of Senator Allison have been more intimately acquainted with him than any man in the Senate. I have always regarded him as a strong, sincere man, and one of the best Senators we have."

Julius Cæsar Burrows, Republican, Michigan: "From the time the State of Colorado was admitted into the Union, in 1876, the Hon. Henry M. Teller has held a conspicuous place in the State and the country and rendered exceptional service to both. No taint has ever touched his good name, and he retires from the Senate on the 4th of March next with the esteem of every Member of the body."

William P. Frye, Republican, Maine: "He is entitled to the gratitude of his countrymen for a lifetime spent unselfishly in the public service."

Joseph W. Bailey, Democrat, Texas: "It has been my good fortune to occupy a seat next to Senator Teller for the past six years, and in this way I have learned to know him in small matters as well as in large ones. I therefore feel that I know him well, both as a man and as a Senator, and I say without reserve or hesitation that I have never known a better man or a more useful Senator. His life has been a blessing to his country, and will be an inspiration to the young men who are to come after."

KNUTE NELSON, Republican, Minnesota: "When I first came to Washington, in 1883, I found Senator Teller Secretary of the Interior, and had a great deal of business with him and his department, and I found him one of the ablest, best, and most efficient Secretaries of the Interior we have ever had since I became acquainted with the administration of our Government. Here in the Senate, where I have been associated with him for the last 14 years, I have learned to love and respect him even more than I did when he was Secretary. He has been and is one of the most vigilant, faithful, energetic, and efficient Members of the United States Senate. I know of no one who can compare with him in efficiency and usefulness except the late Senator Allison. Senator Teller will leave on the 4th of March next a vacuum in the Senate that will be hard to fill."

Isador Rayner, Democrat, Maryland: "His whole public career has been marked by unflinching integrity and ability of the highest order. His loss to the body of which he has so long been a Member is great, but he enters upon his retirement with the esteem and respect of the country."

George C. Perkins, Republican, California: "I desire to be numbered among those who appreciate the services of Hon. Henry M. Teller as a public man and who regret his retirement from the Senate of the United States. No man who has occupied a seat in that body has stood higher in the estimation of his colleagues as to character, honesty, sincerity, and ability. He came to the Senate when Colorado entered the great sisterhood of States, and since then his life has been devoted to the promotion of the best interests of the Nation. The force of his example in private as well as in public life in his State, which is acknowledged by all the people of Colorado to have been great and to have worked for the good of society, has been felt in the United States Senate, which is proud to acknowledge its indebtedness to him. There will follow him to his home the warmest feeling of friendship from all of his colleagues here, who will be slow, I hope, to forget the lessons taught by his most distinguished, most honorable, and most useful career."

Thomas H. Carter, Republican, Montana: "In a very broad sense Mr. Teller has represented the whole country, but in a special manner his voice has spoken not alone for Colorado but for all the great West. Since Colorado was admitted into the Union as a State in 1876, the country which was then known as the "American Desert" and the "Indian country" has been embraced within the boundaries of many virile and progressive States. Henry M. Teller has helped to rock the cradle of these infant States and has ever been a watchful guardian of their interests. His great ability has always been made thoroughly effective by his tireless industry. I venture to say that no Senator in the history of the country has been more punctual and constant in attending the sessions of the Senate or more vigilant in scrutinizing legislative proceedings."

Isaac Stephenson, Republican, Wisconsin: "The retirement of Senator Teller recalls the fact that he is the last of the great generation of public men who took over the problems of life from the Civil War, the others having either passed away to their final reward or taken their places in private life. No man of his time has exercised a larger or a better influence in public affairs. Few American statesmen have ever had a more complete knowledge of the machinery of our Government and its administration. But above his public service, there will always remain in the Senate the memory and tradition of the purity of his life and motives, and the simple, unostentatious Christian character he has exemplified in the midst of the official life in which he has had so large a share for more than 30 years.

"His official life, now closing in the Senate, and his whole career, should be an inspiration to young men—and well might they emulate it. His State loses an honorable and fearless advocate, and may well proclaim: 'Well done, good and faithful servant.'"

John W. Daniel, Democrat, Virginia: "All parties justly respect him, because he combines in his character all the elements of worth. He will be a fortunate man indeed who may fill his high place with equal credit."

J. H. Gallinger, Republican, New Hampshire: "It gives me pleasure to say that after having served for 18 years in the Senate with Hon. Henry M. Teller, I regard him as one of the foremost statesmen that the country has produced. On all questions of a moral and religous nature he is always absolutely and unquestionably right, while on matters of broad national concern he is free from sectional prejudice of every kind. In truth, he is what may properly be called a Christian statesman. We greatly need men like Senator Teller in public life to-day."

WILLIAM E. BORAH, Republican, Idaho: "He is a splendid type of the public servant and his unselfish devotion to his State and Nation is a beautiful exemplification of the highest order of patriotism."

Chester I. Long, Republican, Kansas: "One of the most pleasant recollections of my service in the United States Senate will be my acquaintance with Senator Teller. Those who know Senator Teller best admire him most; and I am sure that he will take with him to private life the good wishes of all those who have served with him in the Senate."

H. D. Money, Democrat, Mississippi: "I have had the honor of Senator Teller's acquaintance since he came into the Senate in 1876, and for many years have enjoyed his friendship. When he was Secretary of the Interior he displayed great ability and never-tiring industry, which accomplished an extraordinary amount of work. His great learning and knowledge of the workings of the Government are unsurpassed; his unflagging energy, his cheerful and amiable disposition, and his never-failing courtesy made him a valuable and esteemed Member of the Senate. Wherever he may go he will carry my good wishes and affectionate regards."

F. E. WARREN, Republican, Wyoming: "I have known Senator Teller for a quarter of a century, first by name and reputation and acquaintanceship as one of the leading public men of the West, and later as being personally associated intimately with him for over 15 years as one of his colleagues in the Senate. In these years of association Senator Teller has always been to my mind a type of public servant invaluable to the country. I know I speak for all of Senator Teller's colleagues when I say that in leaving the Senate he carries with him the respect, friendship, and well wishes of every Member."

CHARLES CURTIS, Republican, Kansas: "His career should be an inspiration to all young men."

P. J. MCCUMBER, Republican, North Dakota: "His acknowledged legal ability, coupled with studious habits, very soon placed him among the leaders of the Senate. A broad-minded scholar, especially well versed in social and political economy, his addresses were always interesting and convincing. No Senator was more highly esteemed by his associates. In his departure the Senate will lose one of its wisest and safest counselors."

William J. Stone, Democrat, Missouri: "Few men have been as useful or exercised such wide and beneficent influence in the country during the last 30 years as Senator Henry M. Teller."

WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM, Republican, Vermont: "In character, ability, and that peculiar knowledge of public affairs which comes from long service, with that integrity and earnest purpose which governs large souls, Senator Teller has performed a service for his State and Government and achieved a name for himself equaled only by a limited number of those who have served in this branch of the Congress."

William Warner, Republican, Missouri: "It gives me genuine pleasure to say that Mr. Teller's services to the Government in the Senate, and in President Arthur's Cabinet, covering a period of a generation, has been characterized throughout by a devotion to country and by a thoughtful and practical consideration of governmental policies. He has been regarded as one of the strong, thoughtful, and reliable men in the Senate, and as a man whose character at all times has been above reproach. His course reflects credit not only upon the State from which he came, but upon the general country, which he has served well."

C. W. Fulton, Republican, Oregon: "His long service as a Senator and wide experience otherwise in public life, his moral courage and mental integrity, united with exceptional natural ability and capacity for legislative work, have contributed to make him one of the most valuable Members of our National Legislature."

Norris Brown, Republican, Nebraska: "His great learning, pure character, and charming personality make him a commanding figure among American statesmen."

Frank P. Flint, Republican, California: "The retirement of Senator Teller from the Senate after nearly 30 years of service will be not only a great loss to the State of Colorado but to the entire Nation. Senator Teller's career has been, and no doubt will continue to be, an inspiration to the young men of our country. He has demonstrated that it is possible for a man to succeed in a political career and still have the courage of his convictions."

Augustus O. Bacon, Democrat, Georgia: "There is no more valuable Member of the United States Senate. With a long experience in public affairs, he is eminently distinguished by his untiring industry and unfailing attention and devotion to his senatorial work. Strong in his convictions and unswervingly loyal to what he believes to be right, his courage has never faltered in following the path of duty as he has seen it. He is one of the most worthy and conspicuous figures of his day and generation."

Simon Guggenheim, Republican, Colorado: "Few men have retired from active public life possessing in higher degree public regard and respect than Henry M. Teller. His tenure of the Interior Department is a tradition for efficiency and in the Senate his work has been of the highest order of constructive statesmanship. But he has besides the confidence of his fellow citizens, due to their implicit reliance in the personal and public integrity that has marked his career and to their well-founded belief in the honesty and sincerity of the motives that have actuated him."

E. J. Burkett, Republican, Nebraska: "For more than 30 years he has been in public life, and since the death of Senator Allison perhaps has a wider acquaintance with public affairs and the details of their administration than any other man. He has been an inspiration to every young man who has had the good fortune to come in contact with him, and in fact to many more who did not have a personal acquaintance but who know his real merits."

N. B. Scott, Republican, West Virginia: "He and Senator Allison of Iowa were the two prominent figures in the history of our country for the past 45 years. I am sure that, regardless of party, every Member of the United States Senate will regret the retirement of this 'noblest of them all,' United States Senator Teller."

W. B. Heyburn, Republican, Idaho: "No man in public life in the United States has done more to uphold the high standard and dignity of the United States Senate than Hon. Henry M. Teller."

Moses E. Clapp, Republican, Minnesota: "Few men have retired from the Senate whose departure has been regretted, genuinely regretted, more than will the departure of Senator Teller, and this speaks volumes for the character of the man. Men who reach the Senate have usually passed the age of sentiment to a great degree and enter the arena where political affiliation plays its part, and for a man to win the affections of such a body is a grander tribute to his character than any words which can be coined. A new man coming to the Senate finds a body of men, in the main, kind and generously disposed, but each one engrossed with his own particular work, and with little time to spare to assist and aid a new Member. Almost instinctively I recognized the kindly disposition of Senator Teller, and this recognition was confirmed by my experience when I came to appeal to him for assistance. No matter how engrossed he was, he always patiently listened and assisted with sound advice or kindly effort, as the case might require. He combines to a rare degree a kindly sympathetic nature with unyielding firmness and absolute courage, and his public life has reflected these qualities."

LAST WORDS.

After Mr. Teller's death the Colorado papers and the Colorado people were full of praise, and pulpit and bar vied with the press in expressions of mingled sorrow and compliment. Governor Ammons led these testimonials, saying:

"The life of Mr. Teller perhaps more closely than that of any man the West has ever produced exemplifies and typifies the attributes and characer of the man who as a whole made the West possible in its present form. Honesty, strength of conviction, singleness of purpose, courage. imagination, enterprise all were his. And linking them all was honor, which recognized no alternative but to follow the dictates of conscience unflinchingly and with regard always to the rights of the many."

Said the Denver Post in one of many laudatory articles:

"It was away from Colorado that the full measure of Senator Teller could be taken. The newer Senators reverenced his years and his vast learning; they reveled in his anecdotes of days that were gone; they learned from him how big or how little men were, and realized that his judgments were not based on prejudice but upon years of close intimate contact with the men whose work and character he diagnosed.

"'While Senator Teller remains a United States Senator that Government may always be sure of its standing in the eyes of other governments.' This is the tribute paid to Colorado's Senator by Lord Salisbury, then premier of Great Britain. What Lord Salisbury thought and said other rulers agreed with.

"Among Senators and other statesmen Henry M. Teller towered a giant. His intellect was strong and always vigorous; his word was his bond; caring neither for social prominence nor for great wealth, his talents were dedicated to serving his country, to making his family happy, and to cultivating his mind as he cultivated his garden."

Of all the testimonials to his character none were more appreciative or intelligent nor more discriminating than that given by the Hon. Wilbur F. Stone, himself a man of great learning and excellent achievement. Judge Stone said in the Rocky Mountain News of February 24, 1909:

"Henry M. Teller came to Colorado in 1861, the year following my own arrival, and settled at Central City, which was then the most important town in the Pikes Peak country. He began practicing law in the miners' courts of that district.

"It was the last year of the law courts and local self-governments made by the settlers of each independent community, and so Mr. Teller was in at the birth of the Territorial organization, authorized by the act of Congress, and he took a leading part in its establishment, pending the period of transition.

"He soon became recognized as one of the ablest and most active members of the bar in the new Territory, and rendered distinguished service in all matters of legislation, the administration of law, and laying the foundations of government for the future State.

"He never sought or accepted a political office previous to the admission of Colorado as a State, when he was chosen by the general assembly as one of the first Members of the United States Senate from this, the Centennial State, and which exalted national position he held for a longer period than was ever held by any other Member of that body west of the Missouri River, not excepting the famous Thomas H. Benton, who wrote his political autobiography, entitled 'Thirty Years in the United States Senate.'

"I became acquainted with Henry M. Teller soon after his arrival at Central City, and the acquaintance ripened into a close personal friendship, which continued unbroken for a half century to the day of his death.

"We were in many lawsuits, civil and criminal, in the Territorial days, sometimes together and other times on opposite sides, and in all his career at the bar I never knew a lawyer with more fairness, open frankness, courtesy to bench and bar, witness and jury, nor of greater fidelity to his client.

"His air and manner in court, the same as everywhere else, was wholly devoid of affectation, imitation, or mannerism. Always dressed neatly in sober black, he was dignified, yet genial, democratic, and always accessible.

"In legal argument he spoke in a clear, even tone of voice and never indulged in vociferation, gesticulation, or theatrical display. His argument to both court and jury was pointed, concise, deeply earnest, and, hence, forcible and convincing.

"He used good English, but of the plain, simple sort like that of Abraham Lincoln, and never attempted to display studied flights of oratory or rhetoric as an appeal to the audience.

"Another notable characteristic I recall is that in a speech or address, whether in the legal forum or the political rostrum or at the banquet table, I never knew him, for the purpose of illustrating a point, idea, or meaning to use a trite proverb or 'common saying,' nor quote from poet, historian, essayist, novelist, or philosopher.

"His mind was well stored by study and reading and in a legal argument, of course, like any other lawyer, he cited authorities and court decisions, but he expressed his thoughts in his own way and in his own logical and unambiguous language.

"As a statesman, former Senator Teller had few superiors in his day. In the Congress of the United States, with a personal character above reproach or suspicion, and keeping himself aloof from all matters of personal pecuniary advantage or aggrandizement, he devoted the years of his senatorial term to the history of American legislation, our relations with other nations and governments, the changes in political, social, and industrial conditions of our own country, and the legislation needful and beneficial to the whole people of the United States as well as to his own State.

"His discharge of the duties of the office of Secretary of the Interior, while he held that position in the Cabinet of President Arthur, was marked by uniform ability, and many needed reforms of especial benefit to the far West were realized through his efforts.

"I think no Member of the American Congress in its history during the last half century had so complete and intimate a knowledge of the West, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific coast; the geography, resources, physical characteristics, people, their needs and calculable future possibilities of each and every State and Territory in all this vast region, including Alaska, as had former Senator Teller.

"His patriotism was of the highest, broadest, and deepest measurement, and his love of Colorado was as the love of the forest pine for the snow-clad mountains rooted in their everlasting rocks.

"As a man and as a personal friend, Henry M. Teller was one of the most amicable, approachable, and kindhearted of all our pioneers and representative citizens.

"Ever faithful to his friends and to his promises, he was perhaps the most popular man during his long public life of any who ever won the confidence of the people.

"Indeed it may be said he was without an enemy. He had political opponents, but even they were not enemies. He represented in his character and his deeds all that stands for the best in morals, politics, social life, law, human liberty, equality, fraternity, and citizenship.

"Aside from the county of Teller, which has produced more gold than any other one mining camp in the world, the name and fame of Henry M. Teller will be perpetuated by the greatest and most enduring monument that can be erected to the memory of any man—the record of his own public life and deeds in the activities of the State and Nation."

It is fitting that these expressions should close with a brief quotation from Mrs. Teller, the Senator's venerable widow, who still survives. She said in an interview: "Even at home Mr. Teller was studious and seldom was found without a book in hand when about the house. Next to books he liked nature, and nothing pleased him more than to get out in the woods with the children Sunday afternoons and tell them about the trees and the flowers. He seemed to know every tree that grew. He was more sociably inclined than he got credit for being, and when we had company gave much attention to guests, relating experiences and telling anecdotes and talking very freely. As I have stated, he was brought up a Methodist, but he allowed his early church membership to lapse. He did not, however, lose his interest in the organization on that account, for he was for many years a trustee of the church in Central City without being a member of the church itself. He always contributed freely to the Methodist cause and in 1902 again placed his name on the membership roll. I think he would have done so earlier but for the fear that people would attribute the act to political motives."

Senator Teller's body lay in state at the Colorado State Capitol in Denver for several hours previous to interment at Fairmount Cemetery in that city, and his face was viewed by thousands. His memory is still cherished by many thousands in the State which he loved and served so well.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 14, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Doc. No. 567); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

982. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the legislative establishment of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for the Capitol power plant, $40,093; and for the Capitol Building and repairs, $17,250 (H. Doc. No. 568); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

983. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental and deficiency estimates of appropriations for the Department of Justice for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for prior fiscal years, amounting to $2,056.03 (H. Doc. No. 569); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

984. A letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report as to the accumulation of documents and files of papers not needed or useful in the transaction of the current business of the department and which have no permanent or historical interest, as well as additional lists consisting of papers in the field offices of the General Land Office; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

985. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico, as authorized by the act approved February 6, 1923 (Public, No. 404), $250,000 (H. Doc. No. 570); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

986. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a description of papers on file in the various bureaus of the Department of Commerce which are not needed or useful in the transaction of current business and have no permanent value or historical interest; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

967. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental and deficiency estimates for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for prior years, amounting to $568,468.39, together with certain proposed legislation (H. Doc. No. 571); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, February 13, 1923.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, pursuant to law, a schedule of papers and documents on the files of the Post Office Department which are not needed in the conduct of business and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING and Mr. DIAL members of the committee on the part of the Senate, and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of the Department of Commerce which are not needed in the conduct of business and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. FERNALD and Mr. SHEPPARD members of the committee on the part of the Senate, and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a list of papers and documents on the files of field offices of the General Land Office which are not needed in the conduct of business and having no permanent value or historic interest, and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Vice President appointed Mr. NORRIS and Mr. KENDRICK members of the committee on the part of the Senate, and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Musicians' Protective Union, Local No. 214, American Federation of Musicians, of New Bedford, Mass., praying for modification of the so-called Volstead Act so as to permit the use of light wines and beers, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of the Woman's Republican Club of Jefferson County, Ohio, favoring the prompt passage of House bill 14254, relative to World War foreign debt settlement, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a resolution of Culinary Alliance No. 142, of Eldorado, Ark., protesting against the passage of the so-called ship subsidy bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of H. Rouw and sundry other citizens of Van Buren, Ark., favoring the passage of the bill (S. 4399) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the executive committee, National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Marketing Associations, at Louisville, Ky., favoring acceptance by Congress of the terms recommended by the American commission on refunding of the British debt, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Salvation Army Conference of Social Workers, in the city of Washington, D. C., favoring the enactment of legislation for investigation of the needs of the Nation for public works to be carried on by Federal, State, and municipal agencies in periods of business depression and unemployment, so as to provide against the recurrence of poverty and distress in such unemployment crises, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution of the North End Club, of New Haven, Conn., praying an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions of the advisory board, Hartford section, of the Council of Jewish Women, at Hartford, Conn., favoring the passage of Senate bill 3136, the so-called teachers' salary bill for the District of Columbia, and Senate bill 2040, the so-called compulsory education and school census bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

[Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of North Dakota, begun and held at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, on Tuesday, January 2, 1923.]

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein)—

Whereas, since the cessation of the war with Germany and the removal of the minimum wheat-price guaranty of the Federal Government, in effect during a part of the period of the war, the price of wheat to the wheat producer of the Northwest has depreciated to a point far below the cost of production; and

Whereas the general level price on articles which the wheat producer is obliged to buy and consume gives no promise of a proportionate reduction, but, on the contrary, appears to be increasing at this time; and

Whereas these circumstances have caused an unprecedented condition of distress to the wheat producer of the Northwest and to all legitimate enterprises more or less directly dependent upon his prosperity and solvency, which condition of distress is so acute as to threaten a great loss of population in the farming communities of the Northwest, accompanied by consequent insolvency, bankruptcy, and other results so dire and serious as to directly and indirectly affect a large proportion of the population of the Nation; and

Whereas the Federal guaranty of a minimum price of wheat during a part of the war period was, in fact, a serious injustice for the wheat producer of the Northwest, resulting as it did in greatly reducing his price far below the level of the price which supply and demand conditions would have otherwise created, and which, therefore, operated as an actual and artificial reduction and limitation of his price and not as a subsidy; and

Whereas the Government of the United States receives $50,000,000 as profits from the operation of the United States Grain Corporation during the war, which really belongs to the producer; and

Whereas the Northwest wheat producer alone, among all the producers in the United States, suffered such arbitrary reduction in the price of his product during the war period, from which the entire consuming public directly benefited, he being obliged during the said period to pay the highest market prices for all articles which he used and consumed, there being no governmental limitation on the price of any such article during said period; and

Whereas this present condition resulting from the foregoing is such as to threaten a calamity: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That we do hereby respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to take cognizance of the present situation in which the Northwest wheat farmer is placed and the circumstances which have resulted in his present condition of distress, and guarantee a minimum price of $1.50 per bushel while this emergency lasts; be it further

Resolved, That inasmuch as the policy of Government aid has been recognized under similar circumstances as being proper and constitutional and was so recognized in the six-months' guaranty provision to the railroads, and is now being urged in connection with the so-called ship subsidy bill, the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged and earnestly petitioned to labor to the end that it may find a proper and constitutional means of bringing immediate relief to the Northwest wheat producer by guaranteed price; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to all Members of both Houses of the National Congress from North Dakota immediately upon its passage and approval.

ROY JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House.
W. F. CUSHING,
Chief Clerk of the House.
FRANK H. HYLAND,
President of the Senate.
[SEAL.]
W. E. PARSONS,
Secretary of the Senate.

This certifies that the foregoing resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, the Senate concurring therein.

W. F. CUSHING,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. McCUMBER presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

[Eighteenth Legislative Assembly, State of North Dakota, begun and held at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, on Tuesday, the 2d day of January, 1923.]

Concurrent resolution memorializing the United States Congress to prohibit the further issuance of tax-exempt securities.

Whereas the Sixty-first Congress of the United States of America at its first session adopted the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America, providing that Congress have the power to collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration, which amendment was ratified by joint resolution of the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota in 1911;

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America subsequently enacted a graduated income tax law levying taxes upon incomes on a graduated basis in proportion to the amounts of the respective incomes;

Whereas the United States Government, the several States of the Union, and all the political divisions of said States now have the right to issue their bonds and obligations in form exempt from taxation under said graduated income tax law;

Whereas the several States and their political subdivisions are actually issuing such bonds and obligations in form exempt from taxation under said graduated income tax law to the amount estimated to be more than $1,250,000,000 per annum;

Whereas the investment of wealth in such tax-exempt securities defeats the universal and equitable application of the United States graduated income tax law and also similarly defeats the universal and equitable application of the graduated income tax laws of North Dakota and the several States of the Union and violates the ability principle of taxation and unfairly discriminates between taxpayers, creating social unrest because of the large investments in such tax-exempt securities by the wealthy classes of the Nation;

Whereas every dollar's worth of income and every person should carry a fair portion of the public expense, and a large and rapidly increasing portion of the incomes of the property owners of the Nation is escaping taxation through investment in tax-exempt securities, thereby granting to concentrated wealth an avenue of escape from its equitable share of the cost of Government, and in so doing is in effect granting a private subsidy to certain interests;

Whereas we recognize the Federal graduated income tax as a most equitable and effective plan of taxation, but realize that both its equity and effectiveness will be destroyed in such proportion as those most able to pay are allowed to obtain exemption therefrom by the conversion of their property into tax-exempt securities, and that this Nation ought not to continue with part of its people taxed and part of its people tax free;

Whereas such tax exemption of securities encourages extravagant expenditures on the part of the various States and political subdivisions thereof in the way of unnecessary public improvements and otherwise, withdrawing funds therefor from the necessary business enterprises of the Nation;

Whereas such withdrawal of funds from the necessary enterprises of the Nation is sapping the business vitality of the Nation, increasing the rate of interest required on borrowed capital for all enterprises not carried on by the Government, thereby adding to the cost of living, discouraging investment of funds in new enterprises that are essential to the proper prosperity and development of the Nation and producing a substantial shortage of funds available for farm-mortgage loans and other necessary financing in our State and the several States of the Nation;

Whereas the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States have both condemned this evil of tax-exempt securities and recommended an amendment to the United States Constitution prohibiting same, the President's statement, as reported to the public press, being in part as follows, to wit: "I think our tax problems, the tendency of wealth to seek nontaxable investment, and the menacing increase of public debt—Federal, State, and municipal—all justify a proposal to change the Constitution so as to end the issue of nontaxable bonds"; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States an amendment to the United States Constitution that will prohibit the further issuance of tax-exempt securities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and the same is hereby, memorialized and urged by the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota to take such action as may be necessary to prohibit as soon as possible the further issuance of securities that are in any way exempt from taxation under the income tax law of the United States Government and under the income tax laws of the several States of the Union; and that it be further

Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be forwarded by the governor of this State to the Secretary of State at Washington, D. C., and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the National Congress, and to each of North Dakota's Senators and Congressmen in the National Congress.

FRANK H. HYLAND,
President of the Senate.
W. E. PARSONS,
Secretary of the Senate.
ROY JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House.
W. F. CUSHING,
Chief Clerk of the House.

This certifies that the foregoing resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Eighteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, the House concurring therein.

W. E. PARSONS,
Secretary of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 3084) to authorize and provide for the payment of the amounts expended in the construction of hangars and the maintenance of flying fields for the use of the air mail service of the Post Office Department, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1143) thereon.

AMENDMENT TO THIRD DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the third deficiency appropriation bill proposing that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to deduct from the amount of the judgment heretofore rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of the Santee Sioux in the case of Mdewakanton and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux Indians, otherwise known as Santee Sioux Indians v. The United States, No. 33728, in the sum of $15,000, and to pay the same to Charles A. Eastman in compensation for his services to the claimants in the case and in full satisfaction of all claims on his part under the terms of the so-called Hill-Eastman contract, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11397) to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MDEWAKANTON AND WAHPAKOOTA (SANTEE) SIOUX.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 13835) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appraise tribal property of Indians, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment proposing to strike out lines 10, 11, and 12, on page 3 of the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL LAW OF PEACE.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 441) was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Whereas war is the greatest existing menace to society and has become so expensive and destructive that it not only causes the stupendous burdens of taxation now afflicting our people but threatens to engulf and destroy civilization; and

Whereas civilizaion has been marked in its upward trend out of barbarism into its present condition by the development of law and courts to supplant methods of violence and force; and

Whereas the genuis of civilization has discovered but two methods of compelling the settlement of human disputes, namely, law and war, and therefore in any plan for the compulsory settlement of international controversies we must choose between war on the one hand and the process of law on the other; and

Whereas war between nations has always been and still is a lawful institution; so that any nation may, with or without cause, declare war against any other nation and be strictly within its legal rights; and

Whereas revolutionary wars, or wars of liberation, are illegal and criminal, to-wit, high treason, whereas under existing international law wars of aggression between nations are perfectly lawful; and

Whereas the overwhelming moral sentiment of civilized people everywhere is against the cruel and destructive institution of war; and

Whereas all alliances, leagues, or plans which rely upon force as the ultimate power for the enforcement of peace carry the seeds either of their own destruction or of military dominancy to the utter subversion of liberty and justice; and

Whereas we must recognize the fact that resolutions, or treaties, outlawing certain methods of killing will not be effective so long as war itself remains lawful, and that in international relations we must have not rules and regulations of war but organic laws against war; and

Whereas in our Constitutional Convention of 1787 it was successfully contended by Madison and Hamilton that the use of force when applied to people collectively—that is, to States or Nations, was unsound in principle and would be tantamount to a declaration of war; and

Whereas we have in our Federal Supreme Court a practical and effective model for a real international court, as it has specific jurisdiction to hear and decide controversies between our sovereign States; and

Whereas our Supreme Court has exercised this jurisdiction without resort to force for 135 years, during which time scores of controversies have been judicially and peaceably settled that might otherwise have led to war between the States, and thus furnishes a practical exemplar for the compulsory and pacific settlement of international controversies; and

Whereas an international arrangement of such judicial character would not shackle the independence or impair the sovereignty of any nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the view of the Senate of the United States that war between nations should be outlawed as an institution or means for the settlement of international controversies by making it a public crime under the law of nations, and that every nation should be encouraged by solemn agreement or treaty to bind itself to indict and punish its own international war breeders or instigators and war profiteers under powers similar to those conferred upon our Congress under Article I, section 8, of our Federal Constitution, which clothes the Congress with the power "to define and punish offenses against the law of nations"; and be it further

Resolved, That a code of international law of peace based upon equality and justice between nations, amplified and expanded and adapted and brought down to date, should be created and adopted;

Second. That a judicial substitute for war should be created (or if existing in part, adapted and adjusted) in the form or nature of an international court, modeled on our Federal Supreme Court in its jurisdiction over controversies between our sovereign States, such court to possess affirmative jurisdiction to hear and decide all purely international controversies as defined by the code or arising under treaties, and to have the same power for the enforcement of its decrees as our Federal Supreme Court, namely, the respect of all enlightened nations for judgments resting upon open and fair investigations and impartial decisions and the compelling power of enlightened public opinion.

REGULATION OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. McCORMICK. I submit a resolution and ask that it may lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 442) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 232) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to child labor.

RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS WORK IN COLLEGES.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, for the consideration of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill, a letter from one of the most distinguished men of the country, the president of Davidson College, North Carolina, advocating the increase in the appropriation for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work in colleges made by the Senate.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAVIDSON COLLEGE,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Davidson, N. C., February 9, 1923.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been drawn to the fact that the bill of the War Department is before the Senate and will later be in conference between the Senate and the House. My special attention has been drawn to the attitude of these bodies toward the appropriation for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work in the colleges. I learn that in round numbers the Budget Commission recommended an appropriation for the ensuing year for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps work of $4,401,000, and that the War Department scaled this as far as they thought it ought to be scaled and suggested $4,121,000. The House of Representatives reduced this to $3,250,000 and the Senate advocates an appropriation of $4,000,000.

I am a man of peace and do not believe in assuming that we are always on the verge of war; yet I know how unsettled the conditions are in the world and that possibly we are not entirely free from the further possibility of trouble. I am not anticipating this, however, for history seems to teach us that after such a clash as we recently had there will be a more or less extended period in which we will not be engaged in conflict. I am therefore rather sympathetic with the reduction of the standing Army to as low a point as is consistent with the condition of the times and the proper policing of our possessions. However, I do believe that we ought to bear in mind the future possibilities and make such preparation as is sane without creating a militaristic spirit in the land.

I think we were taught in the last war that it was fairly easy to quickly train our young men into efficient common soldiers, but that it was practically impossible to as quickly train even our best young manhood into efficient officers in so short a space of time. My idea of an officer may be wrong, but it is this: That he must be by long association and training so conversant with his duties and so accustomed thereto that in moments of intensest excitement he performs them almost automatically and with the utmost coolness. It seems to me that it is very much like learning to drive an automobile and putting the driver under conditions he would find in the crowded streets of a city. If he is a novice he will have learned to drive with smoothness on a country road, where he meets few vehicles and has plenty of room to pass, and where there is no commotion or excitement. Under these conditions he gets along all right. But put him with only so much instruction or experience into the crowded city, such as would be found on the streets of New York, with automobiles dashing in every direction, pedestrians constantly crossing the streets, surface cars going up and down, with the elevated rumbling above his head, which would all be to the novice confusion, turmoil, and excitement, it is a decidedly different matter, and until his driving has become to him a second nature, so that automatically he touches the right lever, he is apt to be jammed into by some one or run into another. This is somewhat the condition of many of the young officers in our last war who were taken out of civil life and given a few months of training and then put upon the battle field to handle men under fire.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps seems to me to remedy this serious condition of affairs without in the slightest degree creating a militaristic spirit, and at the least possible cost to the Nation. The Nation is furnished under this system the very finest of its youth to train for the possible eventualities of the future. It offers them at a time when they are willing to undergo this training. It offers them to the Government through four years of such training, thus slowly and gradually acquainting them with the fundamental duties of the officer through such a period that they soon become practically automatic in the performance of those duties. Later, if the occasion arises, these men can be taken to camps and given intensive training and be turned out practically as finished products as come from West Point itself.

I do not find that students graduating from our college, where they have taken the full Reserve Officers' Training Corps course, have had in the slightest degree any militaristic spirit engendered in them.

Then, if you will take into consideration that this safeguard to the Nation is provided at such an insignificant cost as even the amount suggested by the Budget system, namely, $4,401,000, it seems to me that it is "saving at the spigot and losing at the bung" to cut this amount down a few hundred thousand dollars and injure the efficiency of the whole system.

I wish you would bear in mind that the student taking this Reserve Officers' Training Corps course does it voluntarily, and is not required to do so—certainly this is true in the two advanced years of the course. Now, a student does not come to a college of this character in order to become a soldier, and while he is patriotic, it does not at his time of life appeal to him to prepare against a possible eventuality when he is directly interested in other lines of endeavor and preparing himself for those lines. It is human nature, therefore, to have to appeal to him in such a way as will encourage him to take this course. The Government started out to do this by providing good instruction, a certain amount of clothing, and a certain provision toward payment of board. Almost from the first I have noticed that there has been a tendency to so decrease and curtail these emoluments that it is losing its attraction for the students. It will not do to say they are failing in patriotism. If the occasion should ever arise they will, as before, take hold and sacrifice their lives; but they are not yet men of foresight and judgment—if they were they would not be in college. You can not catch fish by baiting your hook with a statement that it is the fish's duty to patriotically sacrifice itself to the appetite of man. It takes the appeal of a wriggling worm; and somewhat the same thing is true in human nature, especially with young human nature. I think I see a disposition on the part of Congress to remove the worm from the hook and put on the dry appeal of sacrifice to the individual to put away that which would prepare him more particularly for the lines of life he is going into and take up the Reserve Officers' Training Corps course to prepare himself for a possible, though improbable, danger to the country.

I have written far too long a letter and I am not sure but that I have done the cause an injury to ask you to read it, but I do hope you will use your influence to see that this appropriation is not cut down to such an extent that the work of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps becomes inefficient.

I am, very sincerely yours,

WM. J. MARTIN, President.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 13660, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
February 10, 1923.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 24, 55, 64, 65, 75, 117, and 123 to the bill (H. R. 13660) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The Architect of the Capitol, in collaboration with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall prepare plans for the erection of a fireproof addition to the courthouse of the District of Columbia for the use of the office of the recorder of deeds and such other activities of the government of the District of Columbia as the commissioners may designate, including fireproof vaults and heating and ventilating apparatus, and such plans, together with an estimate of the cost of construction in accordance therewith, shall be transmitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment amended to read as follows: "$136,032, of which $111,032 shall be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and $25,000, or so much thereof as may be expended for the purchase of sites for playgrounds and for the improvement of such playgrounds, shall be paid 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "in the vicinity of," and in lieu thereof insert "between"; and in line 15 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after the word "contracts" insert ", as in this act provided."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$1,300,000."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 105, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The president of the board of trustees of the National Training School for Girls of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to purchase a tract of land of not more than 160 acres, situated in the District of Columbia or in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia, as a site for the use of said school, and the said board of trustees is hereby authorized to construct on said tract buildings of sufficient capacity to accommodate not more than 150 persons, the plans and specifications for which shall be prepared by the municipal architect of the District of Columbia. The purchase price for the said tract of land, the erection of the said buildings, and all expenses incidental thereto shall not exceed the sum of $62,000, which amount is hereby appropriated for that purpose. The title to the said property shall be taken directly to and in the name of the United States; and in case a satisfactory price can not be agreed upon for the purchase of said land, or in case the title can not be made satisfactory to the Attorney General of the United States, then the latter is directed to acquire said tract of land by condemnation and the expense of procuring evidence of title, or of condemnation, or both, shall be paid out of the appropriation herein made for the purchase of said tract. The board of trustees of said school may, in their discretion, remove and transport to the aforesaid tract for such legal periods as they may see fit any of the girls who may have been committed to the National Training School for Girls in the District of Columbia, and the board of trustees of said school shall have the same power and authority over such girls during the period of their commitment to said tract, or while they are being conducted to or from said tract, as they now possess over such girls within the limits of the District of Columbia. When the buildings herein authorized to be constructed shall be in readiness to receive girls committed to the National Training School for Girls, it shall not be lawful to keep white and colored girls on the same reservations under the control of the board of trustees of said school."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 112, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to acquire a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, said site to be located in the District of Columbia or in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia, and to erect thereon suitable buildings at a total cost not exceeding $300,000, of which not more than $38,000 shall be expended for a site, and toward said purpose there is reappropriated the sum of $100,000 contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923 toward the erection of suitable buildings for a home and school for feeble-minded persons, to be available immediately. If the land proposed to be acquired is within the District of Columbia and the same can not be acquired by purchase at a price satisfactory to the commissioners, they are authorized to condemn the same under the provisions of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia. If the land proposed to be acquired is without the District of Columbia and can not be purchased at a satisfactory price, the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, shall institute condemnation proceedings to acquire such land as may be selected for said site either in the State of Maryland or in the State of Virginia in accordance with the laws of said States, the title of said land to be taken directly to and in the name of the United States, but the land so acquired shall be under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia as agents of the United States, and expenses of procuring evidence of title or of condemnation, or both, shall be paid out of the appropriation herein made for the purchase of said site. The persons to be admissible to said home and school and the proceedings with reference to securing such admission to be in accordance with law. The authorization to use a site for a home and school for feeble-minded persons on lands owned by the District of Columbia, contained in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1923, is hereby repealed."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 116, and concur therein with an amendment as folllows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$2,500."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 118, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"The Board of Engineers constituted by Public Act No. 441, approved March 2, 1911, is hereby directed to submit through the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the first day of the next regular session of Congress a report on the desirability or undesirability of continuing the said project above Benning Bridge, and if it is to be so continued what modifications in existing project above Benning Bridge appear desirable and in the interest of economy. Such report shall include such recommendations with a statement of the facts and shall include detailed estimates of cost under the modifications proposed compared with the estimates under present plans and the decrease in cost as a result of such modification."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 124, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of the matter inserted by said amendment, before the word "Key," insert "Francis Scott."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 126, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 28 of the matter inserted by said amendment, strike out "extended" and insert "expended."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 129, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In line 43 of the matter inserted by said amendment, after "within," insert "or without."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 127.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, there were certain amendments to the bill which the conferees on the part of the House under the rules of the House had to take back to that body. The conference report was presented last week and agreed to. The House has taken its action on those amendments, and there remains now action on the part of the Senate upon the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, which were practically agreed upon in conference.

Mr. SMOOT. And that will be a complete agreement?

Mr. PHIPPS. It will be a complete agreement except as to one item, which, on account of a technicality, I wish to have taken back to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to further discussion of the matter. I could not object to the Chair laying it before the Senate because that is privileged. If it is going to lead to any discussion at all I must object.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think there will be any discussion upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. With the understanding that if it does, the matter will not be pressed, I have no objection.

Mr. PHIPPS. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 127, agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 33, 56, 76, 83, 105, 112, 116, 118, 126, and 129, and that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 and request a further conference on the same, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. BALL, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. SHEPPARD conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shields
Bayard	George	McKellar	Smith
Borah	Gerry	McLean	Smoot
Brookhart	Glass	McNary	Spencer

Cummins	Keyes	Phipps	Warren
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Watson
Dial	Ladd	Ransdell	Weller
Dillingham	La Follette	Reed, Pa.	Williams
Fernald	Lenroot	Robinson	Willis

Mr. CAPPER. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I dislike very much to take any time in discussing the bill, because I am so anxious to get a vote upon it at the earliest moment, but I can not allow it to pass without expressing my views upon it as briefly as possible.

The indebtedness which we are now, I hope, about to adjust and settle with Great Britain was incurred by the action of both parties. The bond act which authorized the making of the loans to other countries was reported from the Finance Committee, of which I then happened to be a member, and reported by a vote of members of both parties, for at that time during the war party lines were effaced and both parties were equally responsible for the authority given in the bond act to make the advances to countries with which we were associated in the war. The bill passed the Senate by the action of both parties. There was no party line there.

The authority given by that act granted to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to make the loans, limited to $10,000,000,000 in amount. The loans were made by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, alone. If he consulted Members of the House or Senate in regard to them, it was not done officially. He took the heavy responsibility imposed upon him by Congress, the great authority given, and carried it out as seemed to him best. I do not remember that on either side any criticism was made because of his acting on his own responsibility in that way, or that there was any snarling because he had not consulted Members of the House or Senate. He was acting, of course, for the United States, and no sign of party was shown in regard to the fact that he did it alone under the authority conferred upon him without general consultation with Members of Congress.

It now has fallen upon this Congress and this administration to endeavor to adjust the debts. The first one we are called upon to deal with is the one now pending before us, the settlement of the debt with Great Britain, which is, of course, much the largest debt owed by any one country.

The commission appointed to deal with the debts was limited by the law enacted by Congress in regard to the settlement of interest and the maturity of the bonds. It was found that it would be impossible for Great Britain to meet the loan and pay her debt within the limitations imposed by the law. The commission very properly, as I think, then proceeded to determine so far as they could what Great Britain would be able to pay.

Having received their statements in regard to vital points, they have come to Congress for authority to carry out the settlement which has been arranged. It seems to me, however, that as the debt was incurred by both political parties and is a debt of the United States it should be settled now by the action of both parties for the best interest of the entire country. Personally I should have been very glad if the commission had been increased to seven and there had been included in its membership a Democratic Member from the Senate and a Democratic Member from the House of Representatives, but that does not appear to me to alter in any way the relation of Congress to the settlement now pending before it. In the House of Representatives, where the bill was passed by an overwhelming majority, no party lines were drawn and a large majority of the minority party, headed by the Democratic leader of the House, supported the adjustment and voted for it.

I do not think, Mr. President, that it is necessary for me to dwell upon the importance of this settlement. It is a great substantial fact. It is of value to both the countries participating in the settlement and it is also of value to the world. The United States started with the proposition, of course, that there was to be no cancellation of the foreign debts, in which proposition I have from the beginning thoroughly believed. The United States at the close of the war, despite its very great services in bringing the war to an end, made no claim for any territory. It sought for none; it asked for none; it made no claim for reparations; but the country has believed—and it is a belief which I share—that under those circumstances it is only proper that loans which were made by the United States on a business basis should be in some degree at least repaid.

I am certain also that it is the feeling of the people of the United States, and it has frequently been expressed here on the floor, that the United States has no desire to exact usurious interest or to make hard terms with our debtors. We are well aware, and the whole world knows, that we should not go to war with any country for the purpose of collecting a debt; but we propose to hold these debts and try to settle them with our debtors on the most reasonable and generous basis possible.

I am not going into the details of this settlement. They have been most thoroughly and ably presented to the Senate by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and it would be simply taking the time of the Senate uselessly for me again to go over the details.

I desire only to speak in a most general way of the settlement. To us, at least, there is a very large selfish interest in the settlement. Assuming, as we all must, that we have no intention of collecting the debt by force from Great Britain or from any other country, I think that we gain by this settlement a very large amount of money. The time of the maturity of the debt, I know, is long, but we are placing on posterity a large share of the debt we incurred in the World War. I think it is perfectly proper to do so. The issues involved in that war affected not only contemporary nations or peoples, but the manner in which they were settled will, I hope and believe, be of benefit to the world in the future. So it certainly could not be otherwise than agreeable to posterity when we are handing them down, as we shall, the great debt which they must meet, that we should also hand down to them a steady payment on one of the settlements amounting to over $4,500,000,000 which they will from year to year receive.

Mr. President, it being of financial value to us, I ask the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the conditions which surround Great Britain, our debtor, with whom we are making the settlement. Great Britain is carrying an enormous burden of taxation. I have no intention of drawing a dark picture for the purposes of the argument; in fact, it would not be becoming for me to do so, as it concerns another country; I am only desirous of calling attention to facts which I think no one can dispute, and, first, is the heavy burden of taxation which Great Britain is now bearing. In the war she lost in killed, I think, 908,371 men, who were taken necessarily from the youth of the land, who were taken from the men who under normal conditions would have been the bone and sinew of the country for the next generation, to whom the country must have looked to be the fathers of families, but who have been swept away, leaving a very great excess of unmarried women of marriageable age. There was a large increase of marriages in Great Britain immediately after the close of the war, but not a corresponding increase in birth rate, and since then the birth rate, if I am correctly informed by such statistics as I have been able to examine, has been declining; and that, at this moment particularly, is a very serious matter for the country.

The effect of the taxation has been very severe. We all know, as a matter of general information, how many not only of the great landed estates in England but the smaller country estates have been sold under the compulsion of taxation, and how much that class, which suffered so severely in the war, has been obliged to bear of loss and depreciation of homes and lands under the new conditions.

Perhaps the severest blow has been dealt by the enormous taxation and the results of the war to what is called there the middle class—the people of fixed salaries and very moderate incomes. It includes professional men; it includes the clergy; it includes professors in the universities; it includes teachers; and that great body of people living chiefly in the immediate neighborhood or in the suburbs of London, who supply the clerks, cashiers, accountants, and salesmen of the great shops, the banking houses, and all the huge and intricate machinery of modern business. Their earnings, their wages, have not been advanced, or, if advanced, the increase has been very little in proportion to the advances in other directions. Moreover, there has been a decline in the value of the pound. Many of those people who formerly lived comfortably and maintained respectable homes with 350 or 400 pounds a year find themselves reduced to 150 or 100 pounds a year in purchasing power. They are a very important class in Great Britain; they are a very important portion of any modern society, and their suffering has been very severe.

As to labor, immediately after the war there was, as we all know, a brief period of great prosperity, when wages rose; but since that rise and general employment wages have been forced down by economic conditions, and unemployment has again increased until the Government has been forced, or believe they have been forced, to aid those out of work by what they call doles—a very dangerous mode of relief, undoubtedly.

It is true that in the British Empire there are vast regions very sparsely populated and offering large opportunity for labor and for settlement, but the birth rate is declining and emigration, therefore, from Great Britain falls off.

Mr. President, this is a mere outline; I could bring before the Senate from accounts that I have read specific details of what I have stated. I have no desire to be pessimistic, and I am not pessimistic about the fortunes of the British Empire, any more than I am pessimistic about the future of my own country; but the gravity of the situation at the present moment and the conditions which surround the people of Great Britain and her Empire is very great, indeed. Great Britain has not taken the ground that has been taken by other countries owing money to the United States. Despite all these burdens and all the misfortunes which Great Britain has pressing upon her, she is determined to pay, just so far as she is able to pay, and on a fair arrangement, this vast debt.

I think we must all agree that a people, under such conditions as the war has left to them, who are ready to meet this great debt, to meet it on reasonable conditions, show an indomitable courage, a great national courage, an "unconquerable will," a keen sense of financial honor, and high honesty in meeting their obligations.

It is true that Great Britain has a profound interest in the settlement which may be called selfish, but which, I think, goes far beyond her own immediate interest. She is determined above all things to sustain her credit. Of course, the credit of Great Britain has been for more than one century—for two or three centuries—the highest in the world. In the last century and in the eighteenth century the rates at which she could borrow money were far lower than those of any other country, often ranging for considerable periods below 3 per cent. Great Britain's credit is essential not merely to her prosperity but to her very existence, because she is the great commercial nation of the world, and on her foreign commerce she largely depends. If she is to live at all she must maintain her credit, even at heavy sacrifices; and undoubtedly that plays an important part in her effort to pay this debt. But the maintenance of Great Britain's credit is not for her own benefit alone; it is a benefit to the world, it is a benefit to us. England, as I shall show in a moment, is our largest customer; and the few figures which I will give, I think, deserve the attention of the Senate.

We have developed in the course of past years a very great export trade, not merely in cereals and raw materials, which we have had for a very long time, but in manufactured articles as well; and without markets we shall suffer severely.

I wish now to call attention very briefly to the figures which show the importance of the British market to the United States. We exported last year to Great Britain—to England, Scotland, and Ireland, the United Kingdom—$855,875,921. We exported to the British dominions scattered over the world $805,230,833. The total exports of 1922 to the British Empire by this country were $1,661,106,754. Our total exports for the same year were $3,765,192,135. We imported from the British Empire hardly half that amount, and our exports to England are not far short of half of our total exports.

Let me take one or two specific cases.

The value of unmanufactured raw cotton exported to the United Kingdom and Canada was $225,138,105. Of course, the shortage in the crop caused by the boll weevil and other circumstances here has reduced our total crop; but that is an enormous sum to come to us from the export of one crop. Taking corn and wheat, for the last year we exported, in round figures, $67,000,000 of value of corn and wheat; that is, in round numbers, 53,000,000 bushels.

I mention this simply to show the importance of the British market, which is $1,600,000,000 out of a total of $3,765,000,000. Therefore, that England shall be able to buy from us and offer us this great market, her credit must be sustained. The purchasing power of the world has been enormously reduced; and, although we have fared better than any other nation, and have to-day the largest volume of exports and imports, we have suffered and must suffer from the reduction of the purchasing power caused by the war; and that reduction of purchasing power unhappily can not be replaced by any artificial means. Only time will heal the wounds and the losses which were caused by the war; and yet our total exports in 1913 were $2,484,018,292, and to-day they are $3,765,192,135.

It is very remarkable that we have been able to hold the volume of our exports as far as we have, and especially so because the total imports from the United Kingdom and the British dominions for nine months were $256,000,000, and the estimated total for 12 months is $597,000,000, not half what we are exporting to Great Britain and the British dominions.

I think, Mr. President, that, putting this question solely on the pecuniary and, if you choose so to call it, selfish ground, it is greatly to our interest to make a reasonable arrangement with Great Britain for the settlement of the debt, she being the only country which has come forward with any offer at all, and that we shall find our own return not only in the great sum of money which will be paid us in the course of a half century but in the upbuilding and sustaining of British business credit throughout the world.

I am not going into this question any further, Mr. President. What I wish to call attention to far more than to the selfish interest we may have in it is that this settlement between the two greatest commercial and industrial nations of the world—the only two solvent nations in the world to-day—will have the most far-reaching possible effect for good upon the stability of business throughout the world. If we can do something in this direction to stabilize business—and this will certainly do it—to tranquilize the anxiety of people everywhere who are struggling against these adverse conditions in order to get back to a normal condition, we shall have rendered the most substantial service to the cause of peace and prosperity and a return to a normal state that has been rendered since the war.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this settlement of the debt authorized by both nations, and now to be settled by the action of both political parties, as was demonstrated in the House, is the greatest possible practical service to the cause of peace and tranquillity that any nation has had the opportunity to render. It is before us here to-day to utter the decisive word. The House has acted. The Executive has acted so far as he had power. The final word, as so often happens, rests here in the United States Senate. So much is at stake, the settlement is of such value not only to us and to Great Britain but to mankind, that it ought not to fail. In my judgment, it can not fail; and as we are unhampered, free in all our actions, we shall make in this way a contribution to the peace of the world and the future security of peace which has not been made by any nation up to this point since the armistice was signed on the 11th of November, 1918.

A FEW OBSERVATIONS ON THE FUNDING OF THE BRITISH DEBT.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, while I am personally strongly in favor of coming to an early agreement with Great Britain regarding the debt owed the United States and on as favorable terms to each nation as can be arranged for without doing serious injustice to either nation, on the other hand, I feel the general public, who, after all, must, as in the past, foot the lion's share of the bills, have a right to be taken into our confidence, even though we have not been so honored by the representatives of the contracting parties.

I have endeavored, therefore, to acquaint myself with some of the essential provisions of the proposed act for the funding of the British debt, and shall endeavor to set forth a few of my observations and understandings that the record may be available to the public.

According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances for the fiscal year 1922, the obligations of various foreign governments held by the Treasury on November 15, 1922, aggregated $10,045,282,026.60, principal amount, of which $9,386,311,178.10 represented loans under the Liberty bond acts and $574,876,884.95 for the sale of surplus war material under the act of July 9, 1918. Of the first amount, the loans to Great Britain alone amounted to $4,277,000,000 on that Government's notes, payable on demand, and bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, at that time considerably below the rate prevailing in the American money markets, and less than that carried by the short-term Treasury certificates which our Government was forced to issue during and after the latter part of the above period. With unpaid interest, the total amounted to $4,628,657,185.50 on November 15, 1922.

For the funding of these foreign debts Congress created by the act of February 9, 1922, the World War Foreign Debt Commission of five members, with the Secretary of the Treasury as chairman. As originally proposed, the debt funding bill granted plenary powers to the commission, but Congress insisted on the incorporation of four provisions on the ground that it would be unwise to intrust to any five men such absolute and stupendous power as that involved in a funding operation of hitherto unheard of magnitude. These limitations were as follows:

1. Limiting the power of the commission to extend the time of maturity of any of the bonds or other obligations due to the United States, as a result of the funding operation, beyond June 15, 1947.

2. Restraining the commission from fixing the rate of interest at less than 4¼ per cent per annum.

3. Interdiction of the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign government for those of any other foreign government.

4. Denial of authority to cancel any part of the indebtedness except through payment thereof.

The commission was organized April 18, 1922, and forthwith, through the Secretary of State, informed the various governments whose obligations arising out of the World War are held by the United States of its readiness to receive proposals or representations for the settlement or refunding of these obligations. Thus far the following countries have designated representatives to negotiate with the commission: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Finland, France, Great Britain, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, and Serbia.

In July, 1922, Great Britain announced that it would send a special delegation to negotiate for the funding of the British debt, but the departure of the delegation was postponed until after the elections in that country. However, it was reported in our press that Mr. Montagu Collet Norman, governor of the Bank of England, visited Washington incognito last summer and informally presented the British viewpoint. Subsequently the British Government designated as its representatives the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the same Mr. Montagu Norman, who conferred with the commission and presented facts relating to the position of the British Government, as a result of which the proposed settlement of the British debt has been negotiated by the commission.

On February 7, 1923, President Harding, in his personally delivered message to Congress, urgently recommended the ratification of the basis of settlement reached and fully indorsed the reasons underlying this settlement as set forth in the report of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. These may be briefly summarized as follows:

1. That it would not be possible to reach an agreement for funding within the limits of the act of February 9, 1922, creating the commission.

2. That the proposed settlement basis is fair and just to both Governments.

3. That its prompt adoption would be an important contribution to international stability and that the extension of the repayment period will make for the stabilization of exchange and the promotion of commerce.

4. That the payment of the principal on the basis of positive annual installments of increasing volume will firmly establish the principal of the repayment of the entire capital sum.

5. That the repayment of interest has been established at the approximately normal rates payable by strong governments over long terms of years.

6. That it would not be just to demand the high interest rates prevailing during the war and reconstruction over a long period of years, tending, besides, to defeat efforts at settlement.

7. That suitable consideration had to be given to present difficulties in the United Kingdom, as manifested in unemployment and high taxation, through such flexibility of payments during the next few years as would encourage economic recuperation not only in the countries directly concerned but also in the rest of the world.

8. That the settlement has the utmost significance in being a business settlement fully preserving the integrity of obligation and in being the first step in the readjustment of Government obligations arising out of the war.

President Harding in his message emphasized that "the call of the world to-day is for the integrity of agreements, the sanctity of covenants, and the validity of contracts," and that the settlement was "the sincere commitment of one great nation to validate its financial pledges and discharge its obligations in the highest sense of financial honor."

On the one hand he exonerated the commission from having driven a hard bargain with Great Britain, and on the other he lauded it for not proclaiming a rare generosity in the settlement. He praised Great Britain for having come to terms amidst a widespread clamor for the cancellation of all war debt, which he described as a fancied but fallacious contribution to world peace, and at the same time admitted Great Britain's inability to undertake any program of payments conforming to the terms laid down in the act creating the commission. Because of Great Britain's willingness to negotiate a fair and just settlement was reached.

President Harding noted with approval the almost unanimous indorsement given the proposed settlement by the press and the public, and again extolled the settlement as "a recommitment of the English-speaking world to the validity of contract." Asserting that failure to reach a settlement would have spread political and economic discouragement throughout the world, with general repudiation likely in its wake, he described the settlement as "a covenant of peace, no less effective than it would be if joint British and American opposition to war were expressly agreed upon."

Concluding his remarks on the debt settlement, he broadly hinted his opposition to pledging the anticipated payments already pledged in the law creating authority for the loans.

TERMS OF SETTLEMENT.

Mr. President, the terms agreed upon between the American commission and the British representatives, after approval by the British cabinet, were transmitted to President Harding on February 3, and as given in his message are as follows:

THE PRESIDENT:

The World War Foreign Debt Commission created under the act of Congress approved February 9, 1922, having received the mission appointed by the British Government to consider the funding of the demand obligations of that Government held by the United States, reports as follows:

The British Government designated as its representatives the Right Honorable Stanley Baldwin, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Montagu Norman, the governor of the Bank of England, who have conferred with the commission in Washington and presented facts relating to the position of the British Government. The commission has also met frequently in separate sessions and has given the fullest consideration to the problems involved in the funding of the British debt to the United States. It became manifest at the outset that it would not be possible to effect an agreement for funding within the limits of the act approved February 9, 1922, and the commission has, therefore, considered the practicability of a settlement on some other basis, and though it has not been able, in the absence of authority under the law, to conclude negotiations, it unanimously recommends for submission to Congress a settlement with the British Government, as follows:

Principal of notes to be refunded		$4,074,818,358.44
Interest accrued and unpaid up to Dec. 15, 1922, at the rate of 4¼ per cent		629,836,106.99
		4,704,654,465.43
Deduct payments made Oct. 16, 1922, and Nov. 15, 1922, with interest at 4¼ per cent thereon to Dec. 15, 1922		100,526,379.69
		4,604,128,085.74
To be paid in cash		4,128,085.74
Total principal of indebtedness as of Dec. 15, 1922, for which British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government at par		4,600,000,000.00

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

The British Government shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of the principal of the bonds on any interest date upon 90 days' previous notice.

Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates, on December 15 and June 15 of each year: Three per cent semiannually, June 15, 1923, to December 15, 1932, inclusive; 3½ per cent semiannually, June 15, 1933, until final payment.

For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest.

The commission believes that a settlement of the British debt to the United States on this basis is fair and just to both Governments, and that its prompt adoption will make a most important contribution to international stability. The extension of payment, both of the principal and interest, over a long period will make for stability in exchange and promotion of commerce between the two countries. The payment of principal has been established on a basis of positive installments of increasing volume, firmly establishing the principle of repayment of the entire capital sum. The payment of interest has been established at the approximately normal rates payable by strong governments over long terms of years.

It has not been the thought of the commission that it would be just to demand over a long period the high rate of interest naturally maintained during the war and reconstruction, and that such an attempt would defeat our efforts at settlement. Beyond this the commission has felt that the present difficulties of unemployment and high taxation in the United Kingdom should be met with suitable consideration during the early years, and therefore the commission considers it equitable and desirable that payments during the next few years should be made on such basis and with such flexibility as will encourage economic recuperation not only in the countries immediately concerned but throughout the world.

This settlement between the British Government and the United States has the utmost significance. It is a business settlement fully preserving the integrity of the obligations, and it represents the first great step in the readjustment of the intergovernmental obligations growing out of the war.

Respectfully submitted.

A. W. MELLON, Chairman.
CHARLES E. HUGHES.
HERBERT HOOVER.
REED SMOOT,
THEODORE E. BURTON.

In the first place, it is perfectly obvious that the settlement submitted by the World War Foreign Debt Commission is very much less favorable than the 4¼ per cent rate specified by the act creating the commission. To extinguish a debt at this rate would require, besides an annual interest payment of 4¼ per cent, an added installment of somewhat over 2.32 per cent of the total in order to completely extinguish the debt in 25 years. The combined interest and payment of the principal would therefore call for annual payments of somewhat over $300,000,000 per annum for 25 years. This might be contrasted with the $235,000,000 per annum now payable on the 5 per cent British demand notes as interest alone so long as no payments are made on the principal. An additional annual payment of approximately $70,000,000 would therefore have sufficed, under the liberal terms of the debt funding act, to have wiped out the entire obligation in 25 years.

Representations were obviously made by the British representatives, or at least by others on their behalf, that this exceeded Britain's ability to pay. Chairman Baldwin was, in fact, quoted as saying, "These terms are simply impossible," and as a result of the deliberations our commission submitted to British representatives, contrary to one of the expressed stipulations of the debt funding act, certain minimum terms representing a basis of a settlement which the commission deemed it possible for Congress to accept.

Mr. President, Chancellor Baldwin in replying to queries by press representatives on his arrival at Liverpool not only declared the terms of the funding act to be perfectly impossible, "as they would mean paying something like 6 per cent," neglecting to point out that only 4¼ per cent of this rate represented interest, with an added annual installment, however, for extinguishing the debt in 25 years, but he also stated that—unless Congress agrees to the modified proposal we shall have to continue paying what we are paying now. It is a matter of opinion whether it will be possible to find all this money for many years to come. We are pledged up to the hilt to pay it and also to pay back all the capital.

At present the charge is £50,000,000 ($235,000,000) per annum. This has been accummulating for two years and we have only paid £20,000,000 ($100,000,000) on account. The strain of paying £50,000,000 is greater than this country could bear. We could only go on paying something on account and adding arrears to the principal, which is a ghastly thought.

Chancellor Baldwin naturally had to talk with a poor mouth, however distasteful it might be to proud Britain, in order to receive any consideration for the terms which the British representatives apparently brought with them, or at least privately expressed, to fund the debt by a series of bond issues maturing at different dates up to 66 years, and bearing 2 to 2½ per cent interest, the issues maturing earliest being comparatively small, thus carrying the greater portion of the debt far beyond the 25-year limit now prescribed.

Chancellor Baldwin's reflections on Congress and the American public were, to say the least, in very bad taste. To charge that the debt settlement was in the hands of politicians acting in accordance with the views of their constituents seems rather odd. To contrast this attitude with that of the "executive officials," who were represented as being disposed to be reasonable (easy marks?), may become a source of embarrassment to the administration and to the debt-funding commission later on.

Americans were described as "a country, not an urban, people." The Senate was criticized because a majority of its Members came from the agricultural and pastoral communities and as not realizing the existing position with regard to the meaning of the international debt. The British and the American people were contrasted as living, on the one hand, on international trade, while the people of the West were described as engaged in selling wheat and hogs and other produce, though the people of the East were considered by Chancellor Baldwin as more sympathetic to the British point of view.

Regarding the lack of understanding of our rural Senators, Members of Congress, and our pastoral population, possibly Chancellor Baldwin was not aware of our Federal farm loan system, with which many of them have had "funding" transactions. Even the farmer in the West understands that interest runs along at a predetermined rate which is not subject to reduction on a hard-luck plea. As long as the whole or a part of his loan remains unpaid it bears an easily calculated interest. He also knows that, in general, it becomes easier to repay his loan if he is permitted to repay it in installments extending over a period of years. He knows that as the installments are paid the interest burden is correspondingly lightened, thus making it easier to pay his final installments.

Even the farmer knows how difficult it is under ordinary circumstances to liquidate a debt unless a definite and a possible program is agreed upon at the time the loan is made, and in recent years he has learned that the ideal method is to provide for equal annual payments throughout the whole period covered, covering both the interest and the installment required for the extinguishment of the debt at a specified rate, as provided for under the Federal farm loan act.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF DEBT FUNDING.

The simple principles underlying the settlement of a debt or the funding of a debt may possibly be more easily understood by starting with the very simplest case and adding, step by step, such variations as are necessary to correspond to the proposed settlement of the British debt now under consideration. Consider, first, a debt covered by a secured note or mortgage, payable in a given number of years, with simple interest at a specified rate, with a provision for the repayment of the same in installments, the interest being reckoned only on the unpaid balance in case a payment of principal is made within the time limit set. In this case the annual interest payments will run along at a uniform rate until an installment on the principal is paid, after which the further interest payments are correspondingly reduced, and likewise for any other installment on the principal which may be paid. The borrower may also be permitted to continue the payment of the full interest charges as at the beginning even after he has paid part of the debt, the excess interest payments over and above the interest due on the unpaid portion of the debt being added to his payments on the principal. In case a single installment on principal is paid during the life of the debt, and the full interest charges on the whole debt are also paid, the yearly excess of the interest payments will further obviously reduce the interest due at the succeeding interest periods. It therefore follows that year by year the amount of interest due decreases and the excess of the interest payments increases, and it can be shown that the accumulated credits on this basis of repayment are, at any interest period, equivalent to a total credit of all the installments paid, together with compound interest on each at the rate carried by the debt. Since compound interest increases rapidly as the years roll on, the unpaid portion of the debt correspondingly decreases, which makes it easier to be repaid.

The same law applies whether there be a single installment or any number of installments. Each will increase, with the method of settlement described, at compound interest and thus correspondingly increase the total amount credited on the repayment of the debt. As stated above, the best results both from the standpoint of the debtor and of the creditor are obtained when the installments on the debt are paid at regular intervals and in equal amounts and in addition to the corresponding interest charge on the whole amount of the debt.

The simple funding plan consists, therefore, in the payment of interest at a specified rate, usually annually or semiannually, on the whole amount of the debt to be extinguished throughout the whole period required for such extinguishment, together with the payment of a fixed annual or semiannual installment on the principal, usually also expressed as a percentage of the whole debt, the period for the extinguishment of the debt being determined by the rate of interest carried, the periodicity of the interest payments, and the percentage of the whole debt paid as installments thereon at the interest periods.

Such regularity and uniformity of the combined payments of interest and debt installments leads to a relatively simple algebraic formula for computing the aggregate credits on the principal at any time, this being the sum of each of the several annual payments, each with its accumulated compound interest for the elapsed period since the particular installment was paid. Particularly if the payments are extended over a long period of years, the sum of the installments paid on principal falls far short of the total credits on principal, thus making a long period for settlement more advantageous to the debtor than a short period.

On this basis of settlement the annual installment required, at a given rate of interest borne by the debt is less the greater the period for repayment. Hence it follows that on this basis of settlement the annual amount to be paid, including both interest and debt installment, is smaller the greater the settlement period. The payment of a fixed interest rate on the whole and a fixed annual debt installment is therefore really equivalent to interest payments on the unpaid balances, decreasing at an accelerating rate and repayment credits on the principal accelerating at the corresponding rate.

The settlement basis of the British debt proposed by the World War Foreign Debt Commission does not appear to have been fully described in the report of the commission to the President under date of February 3. It is clear that it is somewhat more complex than the basis just described, in that different rates of interest are applicable during the repayment period, namely, 3 per cent semiannually for the first 10 years and 3½ per cent semiannually until final payment, while the installments on principal are apparently 1½ per cent, payable annually. However, a half per cent annual debt installment, together with semiannual interest payments at the two specified rates, will amortize the whole debt in approximately 61 years, while the report of the commission indicates a 62-year settlement period. It therefore follows that either average annual installments must be less than one-half per cent or that they are not equal throughout or that they have been adjusted in some other way.

THE PROPOSED SETTLEMENT COMPARED WITH THE SETTLEMENT OF FARM LOANS.

It has already been made quite clear, it is hoped, that the refunding of the British debt is very similar in character to the method of repaying farm loans, and any farmer who has had dealings with any of the banks of the Federal farm-loan system will readily understand that this is the case.

The ruralite may even be intelligent enough to recognize points of difference in his treatment as compared with the generous concessions made to Great Britain. These may be summarized as follows:

1. While loans under the Federal farm loan act are now limited to $10,000, the war loans to foreign governments had only the sky as their limit and aggregated nearly $10,000,000,000, of which Great Britain secured $4,277,000,000.

2. The interest rate charged the farmer varies between 5 and 6 per cent, while Congress was generous enough to specify 4¼ per cent as a minimum, and the settlement under consideration even fixes the interest at 3 per cent for 10 years and 3½ per cent thereafter.

3. The farmer must pay annually 1 per cent of the debt toward its extinguishment, which on the basis of settlement proposed by our commission the British Government is required to pay one-half per cent per annum or possibly a slightly smaller amount on the average.

4. The funding period for the extinguishment of the debt in case of the farmer varies from 30 to 36 years or thereabouts, according to the rate of interest carried by his loan, and though Congress specified a time limit of 25 years our generous debt funding commission is recommending an extension of the period to 62 years.

5. The farmer is required to furnish safe and ample security for his loan in the form of land and improvements, farm equipment, live stock, and so forth, while the loan to the British Government was originally made on an I O U.

6. In the event of defaults in interest payments the farmer is usually foreclosed, though sometimes he may be granted a breathing spell through deferring interest payments, but at the same old rate compounded; but in the case of Great Britain interest on the debt, largely unpaid, is to be reduced by an amount of approximately $90,000,000 by reducing the interest rate originally agreed upon from 5 per cent to 4¼ per cent.

PRESENT VALUES, ACTUAL AND RELATIVE, OF THE BRITISH DEBT ON DIFFERENT BASES OF SETTLEMENT PROPOSED.

The American public has been led to believe, largely as a result of inspired press matter, that after all there is no very great difference between the settlement plan now under consideration, the minimum interest terms specified in the act creating the World War Foreign Debt Commission, the 5 per cent demand notes now held by this Government, and even the proposal brought with them from England by the British representatives of a settlement on a 2 or 2½ per cent basis.

Aside from the differences in the interest rates which have been under consideration, funding periods ranging all the way from that called for by the "demand notes," which are to be refunded, but which call for payment on demand, to the 25 years specified by Congress as the maximum period, the 62-year settlement basis now under consideration, and the 66-year funding period which the British representatives hoped to secure, according to press reports.

The variations in interest rate, complicated in the proposed settlement plan under consideration by involving different rates, one covering the first 10 years and the other the balance of the funding period; the variations in the funding periods themselves, together with the corresponding variations in the annual payments required for the liquidation of the debt, in turn dependent on both the interest rate or rates and the period applicable, all these make comparisons of real value seem exceedingly difficult. This is, however, actually not the case.

It is obviously impossible to make more than a "qualitative" analysis, as the chemist would say, by merely contrasting the interest rates underlying two bases of settlement. However, it is evident that the higher the interest rate carried, the more favorable is the settlement to the creditor and the less favorable to the debtor, so that offhand one can say that the 4¼ per cent stipulated by Congress as the minimum acceptable rate, the demand notes carrying 5 per cent interest, was already a material concession; but what does this concession amount to in dollars? To determine the answer requires a "quantitative" analysis. In chemistry standardized methods have been developed making for simplification as well as accuracy, and similarly standardized methods have long since been developed for making quantitative comparisons of investments. In fact, while in chemical work the accuracy attainable is very high, it is nevertheless limited by practical difficulties, but the accuracy with which mathematical computations can be made is practically absolute. In addition, the labor involved in such calculations has been enormously reduced by the preparation of computing tables which give, for example, answers for the more common rates of interest and for periods as great as 200 years to such a query as—

What uniform annual amount per dollar of a debt bearing a specified rate of interest must be paid in order to extinguish it in a given number of years?

In order to find the annual amount required to extinguish a debt of $4,600,000,000, or any other sum, it is only necessary to obtain from the appropriate table the amount required for each dollar of the debt and then to multiply this factor by the amount of the debt. Similar tables furnish factors by the aid of which "the present value," or the "cash-in-hand" equivalent of any funding plan, can readily be determined.

Various attempts have been made to justify the proposed basis of settlement by directing attention to the huge aggregate interest payments to be paid the United States during the whole period covered in contrast with the amount of the debt itself. The hugeness of the amount cited is, however, fully explainable by the hugeness of the principal to be repaid and the large number of years allowed for its repayment rather than being an indication of the advantageousness of the settlement. For the aggregate interest payments, no matter what rate of interest may be involved, increase with the amount of the principal and with the period for its retirement. A low rate of interest with small annual repayments on principal and a correspondingly long funding period may therefore be made to appear to the unthinking as even more advantageous than a higher interest rate, higher annual repayments, and a correspondingly shorter funding period, if the aggregate interest is greater in the first case. Such absurdities demand to be challenged as misrepresenting the actual facts.

The only correct basis of comparison of different settlements of the same debt is obtained by reducing each basis to its present worth or value—that is, to its cash-in-hand equivalent. The present value of a settlement is really nothing more than a sum in hand which at a particular interest rate applicable will produce exactly the same annual or semiannual returns as called for by the settlement plan in question.

The present value of different bases of settlement must obviously take into account all the variable factors which are pertinent to the comparison—the amount of the debt, the interest rate or rates carried, the periodicity of the interest payments, the periodic repayments on principal, and the funding period.

The following tables give the factors applicable to the comparison of present values for six different rates of interest ranging from 2 per cent, which the British representatives hoped to get, to the 5 per cent carried by the British demand notes to be refunded, calculated for three refunding periods, 25, 50, and 62 years, all of which, according to press reports, have entered into the discussions.

Table I gives the present values of $1 per annum for 25, 50, and 62 years corresponding to the different interest rates shown at the left. In fact, this is merely a condensed annuity table and may be interpreted as follows: In order to provide an annuity of $1 per annum for the specified number of years, it will be necessary to invest the tabular amount indicated by the interest rate applicable. The amount which must therefore be invested to yield an annuity of a certain number of dollars per annum is obtained by multiplying the amount required to yield $1 by the number of dollars of the annuity.

Table II gives the annual installments on principal required to extinguish a debt of $1 in 25, 50, and 62 years at the indicated rates of interest. In order to find the annual installment required to amortize a debt of $4,600,000,000 in 25, 50, or 62 years at any of the tabulated interest rates it is only necessary to multiply the sum to be amortized by the amount required to amortize a debt of $1 at the corresponding interest rate and for the same funding period. Table 3 gives the sum of the annual interest and the annual installment required to extinguish a debt of $1 in 25, 50, or 62 years at the same six interest rates.

Tables I, II, and III, Mr. President, are rather complicated, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to are as follows:

TABLE I.—Present values of $1 per annum.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, from the basic data given in Tables I, II, and III, we obtain very simply the present value or present worth corresponding to the funding period and interest rates assumed. Table IV is arranged to show not only the relative present worth but also the actual worth on each settlement plan at the interest rates taken as normal as applied to a loan of $4,600,000,000. Further, the tabulation is so arranged that any one of the plans may be taken as a basis of comparison in accordance with the six subheadings of Table IV. This table I ask leave to include in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. LADD. An inspection of section 5 of Table IV shows, for example, that the 5 per cent rate carried by the demand notes represents on a 25-year plan a settlement nearly 8 per cent more favorable to the United States than the 4¼ per cent fixed in the debt funding act, while the 3½ per cent basis is over 7.6 per cent less favorable. In the same manner a comparison of the relative values on the 50-year settlement plan represents differences of, respectively, 12.8 per cent and 12.2 per cent, while the 62-year settlement plan shows corresponding differences of 14.2 per cent and 13.6 per cent for the same interest rates. The data given in Table IV show, therefore, that the differences in the settlement plans become larger as the funding period is extended. The table also shows the present value for each plan in dollars, so that differences in the value of two plans under comparison are obtainable by simple subtraction.

In order to bring out these differences, and especially their magnitudes, more clearly Table V has been prepared. It shows directly the actual differences between the various settlement plans of Table IV for the various interest rates and for each of the three settlement periods, all based on the assumption that the plan prescribed by Congress in the debt funding act is a suitable basis for comparison.

I ask that Table V may be included in the RECORD without full reading, although I wish to comment on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE V.—Differences in present value of British debt on various settlement plans in comparison with plan prescribed by Congress, 4¼ per cent interest and 25-year settlement.

Settlement plan.	25-year settlement.	50-year settlement.	62-year settlement.
2 per cent	−$1,014,581,000	−$1,585,450,000	−$1,770,271,000
2½ per cent	−800,699,000	−1,260,073,000	−1,408,653,000
3 per cent	−580,065,000	−948,344,000	−1,027,244,000
3½ per cent	−352,834,000	−561,389,000	−627,997,000
5 per cent	+366,652,000	+588,897,000	+657,197,000

Mr. LADD. The table demonstrates that all settlement plans are less favorable to the United States than the plan presented in the debt funding act except the 5 per cent basis.

Comparing only the figures for the 62-year settlement, it appears that the interest rate carried by the British demand notes if applied throughout the funding period would represent a present value of over $657,000,000 more than the quite generous plan fixed by Congress, while the 3½ per cent interest basis represents a present value smaller by nearly $628,000,000. The lowest interest rate mentioned in connection with the recent funding deliberations, 2 per cent, would have represented a concession of over $1,770,000,000 as compared with the 4¼ per cent rate, and over $2,427,000,000 compared with the 5 per cent rate. These differences are all of them staggering. The concessions are so large that even if the rate fixed in the debt funding act had been insisted upon Great Britain could surely not have charged us with having the attributes of the pawnbroker or with driving a hard bargain.

President Harding, in emphasizing in his message that the settlement proposed is "the sincere commitment of one great nation to validate its financial pledges and discharge its obligations in the highest sense of financial honor," seems to have been misled, and the commission with him, since any reduction in present value represented by more favorable terms than those underlying the 5 per cent demand notes, if obtained as a result of representation regarding inability to pay more than a fixed smaller amount, amounts in effect to a plea for partial cancellation, and is, therefore, equivalent to part repudiation.

And yet Chancellor Baldwin was quoted as saying that we were lacking in understanding and ungenerous. Possibly he was right in accusing us of lack of understanding in the light of the startling figures which have just been presented. His interview, previously referred to, had the result in his own country that was obviously intended. The British press responded whole-heartedly to his inspiration, but he failed to recognize that the American press, with a few notable exceptions, was no longer so responsive to the hypnotic suspension of all reasoning power from autosuggestion from overseas as it was a very few years ago. The British press raved about blood money and usury, and one paper, the Pall Mall Gazette, even carried a caricature of Uncle Sam standing in the door of a pawnshop under the caption "Uncle by name and uncle by nature," with the anticipated results likely to follow such press matter, the American flag even being hissed in the British movies. On the other hand, our American press resented the slurs cast upon our people and our Congress so forcibly that the British Government—and the British bankers—could not help but realize that the travesty had been carried too far.

While the first cables from England indicated that it would be the British policy to drop matters at present for more favorable terms in the future, and in the meantime to let the debt ride along at the 5 per cent interest—only a small part of which has thus far been paid—the British cabinet promptly reversed its first stand and accepted the Washington proposal. It is even intimated that pressure was brought to bear on the British cabinet by the British bankers, who began to fear that even less favorable terms would be granted by the newly elected Congress.

POSSIBLE FACTORS UNDERLYING THE CONCESSIONS TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Although it appears from statements made by members of the World War Foreign Debt Commission who have appeared at the executive sessions of the House and Senate committee to which the bill now under consideration was referred that the settlement plan to which assent is demanded was submitted to the British representatives by our own commission, it seems rather curious that the 3 per cent and 3½ per cent interest rates agreed upon just happened to be very approximately the averages of the 2 per cent and 2½ per cent plans which the British are supposed to have suggested, or which were suggested on their behalf, and the 4¼ per cent fixed by Congress. There must, however, have been some very forcible arguments made for easier terms, because it is hardly to be supposed that our own commission would have voluntarily and knowingly made concessions of the magnitude as shown in Table V.

On general principles it would appear that our commission, in some way or other, if not as a direct result of representations by the British representatives, was convinced that Great Britain could not make annual payments greater than those which the settlement plan under discussion calls for. And yet, in the House debate it was even suggested that in view of the lenient terms Great Britain would probably be in a position to pay off the whole debt in 10 years. This is surely inconsistent with the theory of semibankruptcy and with the exchange value of the pound, which is near parity at this time. It would seem more likely that the predicted financial recuperation of Great Britain was based on its world control of the rubber market, through which, for example, America alone will be called upon to pay over $100,000,000 as the result of an increase in price of from 14 cents to 42 cents per pound.

It might be well to keep in mind also as our oil supply becomes exhausted Britain makes a bid for the world's supply, and is willing to spend billions on war to secure it, and again in the end America will pay the bills.

It was certainly urged by the British that both the 5 per cent and the 4¼ per cent interest rates were too high; and this deserves proper consideration both with respect to rates prevailing at present and with respect to those likely to prevail in the future. It is obvious that since the original amounts were borrowed from the United States American interest rates should be solely determining. However, American interest rates at present are approximately 4¼ per cent, and what they are likely to be in the future will be largely determined by the policy of the Federal Reserve Board or its possible successor. This is based on the theory that interest rates on Government securities which will keep them at a parity must be greater if the financial policy of the country tends to a steady increase in price levels, i. e., to inflation.

JUST INTEREST RATES AND THE NATIONAL THRIFT CAMPAIGN.

Secretary Mellon, in his New Year's message to the American people, urged greater saving and consideration for the Treasury's needs by the purchase of short-term savings certificates, bearing interest at the rate of approximately 4 per cent per annum. In so doing he asserted that—

> It would be little short of a national calamity if the lessons of thrift and sound investment learned during the war should be lost in these days of reconstruction, when the need of avoiding waste and extravagance is as great as ever. Treasury savings certificates will help the Government to finance the debt left by the war. But they will do more than that; they will afford an opportunity to the people of the country to save from their income and, by investing regularly in Government securities, to build a foundation for future financial independence and success.

Secretary Mellon is probably acting on the wise judgment expressed years ago by Barnum, the showman, that "there is one born every minute," and on the short memory of the average individual, who, even though badly stung, always comes back for more.

A very few years ago thrift was a magic word wherewith to conjure, especially when coupled with the stirring appeal to buy Liberty bonds; and the public bought "'til it hurt," in accordance with one of the most effective slogans employed by the four-minute men, who patriotically polparrotted the words put into their mouths by those behind the scenes who were reborrowing the proceeds from the banks at nominal interest and investing in "war babies" and in other lines of business yielding unconscionable profits. In addition, the Liberty bonds bought by the public on monthly payments and deposited with the banks served as the basis for huge additional loans to the war profiteers. Of course it would have been declared unpatriotic for the public to have expected more than the 3 to 4¼ per cent yielded by the Liberty bonds.

How the Liberty bond buyer was fooled! Instead of the bonds being what they were represented to be, the best and the safest in the world, it did not take long after the armistice before they began to decline, striking bottom at 84 cents on the dollar or thereabouts almost simultaneously with the beginning of the era of unemployment, when the great majority of the buyers were forced to sell or starve. This accomplished, and the bonds safely in the possession of those who coveted them, the market price again rose to par or thereabouts.

That was not, however, the most grievous wrong inflicted upon the victims; for the more bonds they bought, the higher the prices the Government could pay to its "paytriotic" war contractors and the higher the prices of necessities rose, as well as the profits thereon, and inversely the more the purchasing power of the dollar shrunk, falling to less than half its pre-war value, thanks to the effective cooperation of the so-called Federal—though privately controlled—reserve system. On pre-war savings, consisting of hard-earned dollars of 1914 or earlier invested in these bonds, the Government paid an average of somewhat over 4 per cent interest; but instead of receiving even 84 "1914" cents on the dollar when the holder was forced to sacrifice, his principal was repaid him in money itself worth 50 cents or less on the dollar as compared with its 1914 value.

For a $100 bond held from 1917 to 1920 the interest yield averaged about $12 of decreased purchasing power, equivalent to, say, 8 "1914" dollars; and if the bond was sold, for example, at 84, these $84 were equivalent to but 42 "1914" dollars, thus making the net return, both interest and principal, about 50 "1914" dollars. The investor thus lost not only all his interest but half his principal as well.

Another era of "prosperity" is now proclaimed from the official housetops. This the financial columns of the daily press—which few people read—translate into higher prices and higher profits for business. The public is therefore again exhorted to loan the Government money by investing in the savings certificates, bearing low rates of interest, so that the Treasury demands will not interfere with the credit inflation necessary to enable business to enjoy the "prosperity" until another crisis, followed by business depression and unemployment, is reached.

Indeed, a national movement fostered by the Young Men's Christian Association, in cooperation with 44 national, civic, commercial, educational, and religious organizations, was even launched for promoting Secretary Mellon's plans. The week of January 17 to 23 was set aside as "thrift week," and everywhere committees were organized to assist in putting it across. On these committees the local banking interests were especially well represented. Prominent citizens were invited to address meetings to be held in schools, clubs, business houses, shops, and so forth.

However, the average price level and the cost of living are already climbing at the rate of 1 to 2 per cent a month, and the dollar is correspondingly shrinking in real value, in terms of the commodities it will buy. Mr. Mellon's New Year appeal to the American, as characterized by P. T. Barnum, may therefore be translated as follows:

Save and be thrifty, invest your savings at 4 per cent per annum in United States savings certificates, and the great and ever-just United States Government will see that your investment will be repaid in dollars which a year hence will be worth 12 to 25 per cent less than those you loaned me.

What a hollow mockery is being made of thrift since the power to regulate the value of money, imposed on Congress by the Constitution, was in effect transferred to the tender mercies of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve system!

In this connection it is important to examine the current rates quoted on British securities in the London markets. According to the New York Times of Saturday, February 11, the following rates apply:

	Asked.
British Victory, 4 per cent	85¼
British Fund, 4 per cent	83⅜
British National W. B., 5 per cent	95½
British Exchequer, 5½ per cent	98¾

It would therefore appear that at the present time it takes more than even 4½ per cent interest to keep British bonds at parity.

The secrecy with which the funding conferences were clothed and the secrecy imposed upon the congressional committees would almost lead to the assumption that the concessions made by our commission must have been based on some as yet undisclosed understandings, and it may be surmised that the British banking interests and the American banking interests must have played a very important part even along these lines.

Mr. President, another basis for the concessions to Great Britain proposed by our commission, which may have played a very important part, is the recognition of Great Britain's contributions to the war before the entry of the United States, the treasure spent, the lives lost, and the sacrifices made by Great Britain in the common victory.

Of course, proper weight should be given to these considerations; but it must also be noted that while America entered the war for the sake of saving humanity and civilization, for making the world safe for democracy, and for bringing to end all war, Great Britain, as a result of the victory, added enormously to its already enormous empire.

In discussing the question of proper interest rates, a comparison might be advantageously made of the interest basis proposed, 3 per cent and 3½ per cent, and the rate of return on capital allowed the railroads under the Esch-Cummings Act, 5½ per cent, and with that earned by other public utilities as fixed by the State public service commissions at an average of 8 per cent or more. Of course, the American public is burdened with the repayment of such capital charges in the form of rates and charges for service furnished. It is also of interest to contrast the favorable rates it is proposed to grant to Great Britain with the rates of interest legalized by the various States and the District of Columbia.

Comparisons with the still greater return exacted by big business might at first sight be considered unfair, on account of the customary allowance for what is termed "business risk"; but this should really be taken into consideration in funding the loan to a government when a rising political party in the particular country, not unlikely to obtain political control within a decade, has announced itself in favor of the repudiation of all such loans; and the longer the settlement period, the greater is the obvious risk.

Mr. President, a rather interesting deduction may be drawn if it be granted that Great Britain is really so badly off as to justify making the concessions recommended by the debt commission and not even able to pay interest at the market rate to the United States to an amount of $200,000,000 per annum, and surely the acceptance by Congress of the debt terms under discussion will largely be justified on this basis.

If Great Britain, with the pound sterling quite near par, is only able to pay interest on its debt to the United States at the rate of 3 per cent for the next 10 years and 3½ per cent for the following 52 years, together with an additional one-half per cent per annum for amortization of the debt in a period of 62 years, the question can be properly raised as to the terms which will be regarded as fair and equitable for the settlement of the debts of France, Belgium, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Liberia, Serbia, Rumania, and Russia, with their progressively decreasing exchange rates as quoted in the New York Times of February 11.

Although the quoted exchange rates are largely fixed by the international financiers, they are nevertheless measures, however rough they may be, of the relative ability of the respective governments to redeem their obligations, domestic as well as foreign. In addition, and sad to relate, practically all of these countries are faced with unbalanced budgets, largely the result of heavy military expenditures, so that the exchange rates are still on the toboggan; and unless there is a change of policy the money values will rapidly go from bad to worse, approaching the absolute zero as their limit.

It would therefore appear that the implied suggestion in the President's message and in the bill under consideration that the debts of the other governments would be settled on "equally favorable terms," or even on "similar terms," as originally proposed in the Smoot-Burton bill, is doomed to disappointment. The further concessions it is proposed to make to Great Britain, as recommended by our commission, may be considered as a subsidy to the British taxpayers at the expense of the American taxpayers, so that it is not surprising to find the debt plan linked with the ship-subsidy plan in President Harding's message.

From what I have said it does not necessarily follow that I may be unwilling to support the proposed plan for a settlement, providing these are the best terms that can safely be adopted at this time. There is, however, another feature of the bill that does not wholly appeal to me, and that is the possible depression in prices for our own bonds to be used in payment. Having started on another apparent period of mild and gradual inflation, when will deflation follow, and what manipulation may be inaugurated to the disadvantage of our own bonds and to the detriment of our producers of wealth? These are matters that may, in my judgment, be well considered, for we shall have to deal with this question later.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, before the pending bill comes to a vote I want to say a few words explaining my position, and to state why I intend to vote for the proposed settlement with Great Britain, so far as the Government debt is concerned, provided the bill is not amended in a way that will be unsatisfactory. I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] proposes to have the bill so amended as to relate only to the British debt settlement, and if it is amended in that way, and in that way alone, I intend to support the bill, and I want to give a few reasons why I intend to do so.

As I understand the proposition, at the time this loan was made it was agreed that the loan should bear 5 per cent interest, but subsequent to that time Congress passed a law by which it was provided that the foreign debts might be settled on a basis of 4¼ per cent interest, so that so far as the proposed settlement is concerned, we can take it as the original basis that the loan is now due, and that the contract is that it should bear 4¼ per cent interest.

The British Government have made a proposal to us for a settlement on a different basis. They say that they can not pay the principal now; and that is apparent to everybody. Nobody expects them to do so. If they could pay the principal now, it would be a very unfortunate thing for them to do, so far as our own people are concerned, because it would absolutely unsettle international finance.

The British Government say they did agree to pay 4¼ per cent interest, but the original 5 per cent and the 4¼ per cent were based on the value of money during war and not in time of peace. Those were the rates at which Government money could be purchased in time of war and not in time of peace. Now they come to us and make a proposal to us to settle on a peace basis. It goes without dispute, I take it, that everybody recognizes that a government's credit is of a different value when it is extended in time of absolute peace from the value when the government is engaged in a great war. The value of a loan is measured by the interest rate. When money is purchased, it is purchased with an agreement to pay the principal back at a future date, and to pay a certain rate of interest, and of course, as everyone who loans expects the principal to be paid back, the real basis of the purchase is the interest rate proposed to be paid pending the period of the loan.

It is common sense to expect that the interest rate for a loan during war times is naturally higher than that during peace times, and the British Government come before us now and say: "We are willing to settle up to date. We can not pay you the cash now." We are not demanding the cash now, so far as I know. I have heard of no one who is demanding cash. They say: "We are willing to pay you up to this date on the basis of your war contract; that is, we have calculated the interest at 4½ per cent under the war contract up to December." Am I correct about that?

Mr. SMOOT. December 15.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And they say: "We put that in as a new principal"; and that is not objected to. They are authorized by an act of Congress to do that. So we come down to December 15, the day on which the new settlement shall go into effect, practically speaking, as an international loan of to-day, and they pay, by giving their obligations, the amount of the debt and the war-time interest of 4½ per cent up to that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact, further, that Great Britain has already paid $250,000,000 as interest, and a great part of that interest was at 5 per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask, right there, how much of that was at 5 per cent and how much was at 4½ per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. In about two hours I will have the date of every obligation made by England and the amount of interest that was paid at 5 per cent up to the time the rate of 4½ per cent went into effect. Then I shall state to the Senate the average rate of interest under the proposition presented here, from the beginning of the loan down to the present time. I shall have that information in a couple of hours.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, that is interesting, and I am glad the Senator is going to put it into the RECORD hereafter, because we ought to have the exact facts; but for the purpose of this argument I am not interested in the details. I am interested only in the substance, and what I say I think I can say without contradiction, that the British Government propose to live up to their war-time contract to the hour of settlement in December, when the commissions met to make the settlement, and to pay the principal in full and the war-time interest of 4½ per cent. Then they ask us to strike a new balance and make a new contract on a peace basis. That is the issue before Congress. The British propose that we shall make them a new loan, and of necessity we must make them a new loan, because they can not pay the principal now, and we would be very unwise to accept it now if they could pay it, because it would so disturb international finance as to destroy our markets abroad. That is so apparent that I do not think it can be contradicted.

Then the question comes as to what would be a fair basis on which to make a new loan in the future on a peace basis. Of course, speaking broadly, we would all be glad to collect the full amount of the debt, with the war-time interest; at least that is the way a man who loans money usually looks at it. But viewing it from an equitable position, that is not the way a fair creditor should look at it when he is dealing with one who has been his friend in the past.

Now, the question is as to what this money is worth. I believe the debt is to run 62 years, unless the British Government exercise their option to pay it sooner. That looks like a long-time loan, but in the condition of international finance I am not sure but that a long-time loan steadies the financial condition of the world better than a short-time loan.

Our farmers and business men will get the benefit of this steadying of the financial conditions, which they would not get if the loan were for a short time, payments to be made at an early date. So the real problem with which we are confronted is the question of what this money is worth for a Government loan on a peace basis.

We can not measure the value of this money as a Government loan on the basis of an individual loan. It is a different proposition. We know perfectly well that the rate at which the Government of the United States of America can borrow money, or at which the State of Alabama can borrow money, is very different from the rate at which some great railroad company or industrial company in the United States can borrow money. All of them agree to pay back the principal, but the difference is measured by the rate of interest; and, of course, we have to look at this question from the position of what money loaned to a government is worth.

Let us look at our own situation. I looked at the morning paper a moment ago and found that on the opening of the stock market in New York on Liberty bonds yesterday, Liberty 3½'s which run to 1947 unless the Government exercises its option to recall them in 1932, the market price was $101.78; in other words, a hundred dollar bond was selling for $101.78. Liberty 2's, bearing a rate of 4¼ per cent, running to 1942 unless called by the Government in 1927, were selling, at the opening of the market, at $98.70; in other words, a hundred dollar bond sold for $98.70.

The 4¼ per cent bonds sold in the market for more than $3 a hundred less than did the 3½ per cent bonds, because the 4¼ per cent bond is subject to taxation by the United States Government under the income tax law, and the 3½ per cent bond is not subject to taxation under the income tax law. Of course, they are all subject to taxation under the inheritance tax. This shows that there is a material difference in rates, the 4¼ per cent bonds selling for less than the 3½ per cent bonds.

Suppose we assume that they are both selling at par. There is a difference of $3 a hundred in favor of the untaxed bond. But assume that they happen to be selling on an equal basis, both at par; what demonstration would we have? It is a clear demonstration that 4¼ per cent taxed interest is equal to 3½ per cent untaxed interest, according to the viewpoint of the purchasers in the bond market.

The best opinion we can get is what the buyer of bonds will pay for them. Very well; what have we in this settlement? During the war we had a 4¼ per cent bond. We reduced it to 3½ per cent. I have not a doubt in the world that the Government of the United States would say to the purchasers of those bonds, because the Government has the right to sell them on the market, "If you buy these British bonds, we will not tax them."

Mr. SMOOT. They can not be taxed unless a law of Congress were enacted to do so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; but if the Government chooses to say that and offers to sell them on the market as untaxed bonds, as it has a right to do, they will sell at par at 3½ per cent, because our own bonds sell for the same reason.

Mr. SMOOT. With the 62-year period they would sell above par.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the statement I made is reasonable. So, then, the question is in making the settlement in times of peace, Are we to put our allies' bonds on the basis that they must pay interest on the basis of a taxed bond or an untaxed bond? If we want the money back and are willing to sell the bonds in the market on an untaxed basis according to the market quotations of to-day, there is the distinction. So I say that on the basis of a settlement dollar for dollar it is a reasonable proposition when we consider that we have no right to subject our late allies' bonds to taxation for this Government, because if we subject them to taxation, of course, the money goes into the pockets of the Government, and governments can not deal with each other on that basis. We do not even deal on that basis as between the Government of the United States and the States of the Union. We keep our taxing hands off of the States of the Union and they keep their taxing hands off of the securities of the Government of the United States. That is a principle that has always been recognized, and we have no right to put this business transaction with the Government of Great Britain on the basis that we would if it were a matter of taxing its securities.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand the Senator to say that if the bonds which the Treasury of the United States is to accept from Great Britain should pass into private hands, income from them would not be subject to taxation by the Government of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Is the Senator asking me that question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; or any Senator who can answer it.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I say the interest upon the bonds would not be subject to taxation under our existing law, and if we undertake to impose taxation upon the interest on foreign bonds, immediately England would impose a tax upon the interest from our bonds owned by her subjects.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So we are proposing to absorb $4,000,000,000 of British bonds which may be sold to private interests in this country and be free from taxation by the Government of the United States or by any State.

Mr. SMOOT. If they are free from taxation, but I do not know whether they will be sold to individuals in the United States.

Mr. LODGE. They would pay the same tax that our Government bonds do.

Mr. SMOOT. Under our existing law they could be required to do it if the Congress wanted to tax them.

Mr. LODGE. They would bear the same rate of taxation that our bonds bear. The 3½ per cent bonds bear only the inheritance tax.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The income from our Liberty bonds is taxed as a general proposition, with some exceptions. Do I understand the income from the British bonds, if held by American interests, would not be subject to taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. It would not be subject to the taxation I referred to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that raises a very serious question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think it is so serious a question, and I would like to proceed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will not the Senator from Alabama permit me to clarify the matter? The Senator made a statement and I was amazed at it, I must confess. We tax the income from the Anglo-French bonds in this country at this time. They are not exempt from taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. It would be perfectly ridiculous to think that Americans could buy the bonds of foreign countries and not be taxed on the income from those bonds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I would like to yield to the Senator from Nebraska, but he is carrying the discussion into a realm in which I am not engaged or interested at this time. I think the statement came from the Senator from Utah and not myself. I attested his statement merely upon the basis that to tax anything we have to fix the basis of taxation by law, and I take it that what the Senator from Utah meant was that the present taxing law would not reach these bonds, that they will lie in the Treasury of the United States, and therefore will not be subject to taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I realize that; but I am propounding the question whether, if the Government sells these British bonds to private interests in this country, those private interests would escape taxation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I understood the Senator from Utah to say was that they would. I do not express an opinion on the subject because I have not investigated it, but I assume that he meant the present law would not reach the bonds, but whenever they get into the hands of a citizen of the United States the Congress can enact such laws as it wants to in reference to them. The Congress can tax them or untax them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The place to do it is on the pending bill before they enter into the hands of interests in the United States. We can not afford to permit $4,000,000,000 more of tax-free bonds to get into private holdings in this country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, Mr. President, I am amazed that my friend from Nebraska should make such a statement. It is absolutely beyond any qustion involved here. Here we have a debt settlement with another Government, and the Senator has said it is necessary for us to inject into that settlement a local issue between our Government and our own citizens.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Alabama takes a view about tax-free securities entirely different from mine. He opposes the theory of doing away with tax-free securities. I take the view that tax-free securities are an evil in this country and that it enables great quantities of capital to be invested and escape taxation. I am opposed to having $4,000,000,000 of additional tax-free securities injected into the markets of our country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I am saying to the Senator from Nebraska is that that is not an issue involved in this matter at all.

The Senator and I do differ as to the general proposition, but that is a constitutional question and has nothing to do with the pending bill. As to whether the securities shall remain tax free or be taxed is a question undoubtedly that the Congress of the United States by legislation can establish at any time it wants to. But it has nothing to do with our settlement with Great Britain.

The question I was arguing when the Senator from Utah injected his statement into my speech was simply that in settling with Great Britain we have no right to settle with her on a tax basis. We should settle, if we settle justly, on the basis of what is a reasonable rate of interest on these bonds for the Government of the United States. If we want to sell them in the market and say to the owner of the securities purchased in the market, the citizen of the United States, that he shall pay taxes on them, then we burden the bonds to that extent, but we have a right to do it. We can do it, but if we are going to put that burden on them we have no right to put the burden on an international ally which is a government. That is what I am contending. We have no right to say to another Government, "We will make you not only pay your interest but a tax as well." Of course, that depends on the interest rate. The Senator from Utah may be right that as they stand to-day the bonds could not be taxed, but they can be made taxable at any time the Congress desires to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to have the Senator from Utah clear it up while we are on the point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend from Nebraska will pardon me, but that is a question between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Utah and is of no interest to me whatever. I do not care which way it is decided. I am trying to make a statement as to my viewpoint in this connection, and if the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Nebraska will kindly take the floor in their own time I shall be glad to have them settle it, but not in my time.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not want to enter into the discussion at all. I was going to say to the Senator that it depends on whether the bonds are tax-exempt bonds or taxable bonds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My position is not at all material to the argument of the Senator. I have no doubt if the bonds are nontaxable now that when we sell them to citizens of the United States we can make them taxable, or if they are taxable now and we want to sell them to citizens of the United States and get more money from them, we can make them nontaxable. But that is a question for the Congress to determine hereafter.

The point that I am making is that on the basis of peace and looking at it from the standpoint that we have no right to tax a debt of a foreign government, this is a reasonable settlement so far as the interest rate is concerned. If we want to assume, for argument, that they are going to pay 3 per cent interest for 10 years and 3½ per cent interest for the balance of the time, and assume the fact that 4½ per cent is the real rate of interest, of course we can show that we are going to lose a lot of money. That is a mere matter of figuring.

I may have placed a land mortgage on a farm when I had to pay 8 per cent interest, and by reason of the legislation of Congress providing for farm-loan bonds the rates of interest in my neighborhood may have been reduced to 5 per cent. When I come to renew the mortgage I tell the man I must have it at 5 per cent or I will take it to a farm-loan bank. He then says, "I will lend you the money at 5 per cent." I suppose on that basis it would be calculated that he lost 3 per cent a year. We might, on the basis of this argument, contend that the difference between 4½ per cent and 3 per cent is 1½ per cent. But that is not the issue. The issue is whether this is a fair rate of interest, everything considered.

But, Mr. President, I merely state that as a premise. I think the settlement is a reasonable settlement and ought to be made. The reason why I say it ought to be made is because the most important question that is confronting the civilized world to-day is a settlement of international finances. The difficulty in the world to-day is that its financial conditions are so unsettled that the world can not do business.

I want to impress on those to whom I have the pleasure of speaking that from my viewpoint we can not have a real satisfactory business or anything approaching prosperity in the United States until Europe is on the mend. We are part and parcel of the world's great economic system. Distress anywhere rests on us, and the present great disarrangement in Europe can not help being a tremendous drag on our own advancement.

That is the proposition. As long as Europe is financially in distress we will be in distress. As long as Europe fails to have a normal buying capacity the products of our labor and the products of our fields and factories will not reach a normal price in the markets of the world, and our people lose that much in the marketing of their crops and the other products of their labor.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the list of commodity exports and imports between Europe and the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, published by the Government, shows that our exports to Europe for the year ending the 30th of last June amounted to $2,067,027,605 and our imports from Europe amounted to $820,473,712, leaving a balance of trade between Europe and the continental United States of $1,236,553,893 in our favor. That balance of trade must be paid. It will be of no value if it is not paid. How is it going to be paid? There is no gold in Europe with which to pay it, and there is not going to be any. Before the Great War Europe owned and held four billion or five billion dollars' worth of American securities, and if the balance of trade went against her she could sell our securities. Europe practically holds none of those securities now. Instead of being a debtor nation, as we then were, we have become the great creditor nation of the world.

From a statement issued by the Department of Commerce some months ago it appears that the Governments of Europe to-day owe our Government $11,500,000,000 of war debt and the interest thereon; that, in addition, they owe to our people $4,000,000,000 balance on open account, and there are $2,000,000,000 of European securities which are owned by private account in America. In other words, Europe owes us to-day $17,500,000,000, according to the statement, and I think in all probability the indebtedness really equals $18,000,000,000.

Mr. President, if we count the interest on that account, assuming that all these debtors are solvent, and then charge an amortization account of 1 per cent or one-half of 1 per cent, it would require of the European nations which owe us, in order to balance their accounts, in addition to the balance of trade of $1,200,000,000, the payment of another billion of dollars, making over $2,000,000,000 which would have to come to our shores in order to pay for our crops, to pay for the products of our labor, and to pay the interest and amortization charges on debts due us.

How can it come? Where it is going to come from? There is no way in which I know that this money may be paid except through international trade. Of course, there was some money which flowed out of this country, carried or sent back to the old country by the immigrants; but that practically ceased with the closing of the door to immigration. There is some little money going back into Europe from this source, but it is comparatively little. At one time Great Britain, Norway, and Germany and other great countries of Europe had the trade of America on the high seas and we paid them for carrying our trade, but to-day we ourselves are in the shipping business. There is comparatively little when the trade is balanced as a carrying account that goes to the European ledger, so we can not be paid in that way. We all recognize that there are no American securities abroad to come back here with which to pay this debt, and there is not gold abroad with which to pay it. So in the last analysis it comes down to the question of trade.

I did not rise, Mr. President, in order to discuss the tariff or to inject that issue into my argument. I merely wish to say in passing that instead of lowering the tariff wall we have raised it and, of course, that has a tendency to keep foreign trade out of this country. I should like, however, to inquire of gentlemen who say this settlement is unreasonable, How are we going to collect the money, not merely to pay the debts which are due us—we might abandon our debts—but how are we going to collect the money to pay for our cotton, our corn, and our wheat and our cattle, and products of that kind which we ship to foreign markets? That is the issue; that is the question on the answer to which depends whether or not the American people shall be prosperous in the future. The debt is a minor question compared with the prosperity of the toiling masses of the American people. I want to know where we are going to get the money.

I said a while ago I thought it was very fortunate that Great Britain did not assume to pay this entire sum of money now because if she strained the finances of Europe to pay us $4,000,000,000 at this good hour there would be no market to-morrow for cotton or corn or wheat or cattle, because Europe would have nothing with which to pay us. The markets of Europe have not died out; some millions of men were killed on the field of battle, but the great population is still there, and that great population are prepared to eat as much as they did before the war if they could pay for it. The reason the demand for American products in European markets has fallen off is not that the vacuum is not there for them to flow into, not that the people do not desire them, but they have no means of paying us for our products.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the question I am about to ask not in a controversial mood, because I entirely agree with the Senator, but what outlook is there for our foreign market getting better?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I do not want to inject an issue that is not involved here, but the Senator has asked me a question, which I will answer if I can. I think the only opportunity there is for better trade conditions between this country and Europe is to encourage international trade and tear down our barriers at the customhouse, or to lower them, at least. I do not say it is necessary for us to come to free trade, but where tariff rates are prohibitive we should lower them and allow some products of foreign countries to flow in here to pay for the products of the toilers of America. A creditor nation can not build up international trade by erecting barriers at its customhouse. I have indicated the only way that I can see that trade conditions are going to get better, but I do not want them to get worse. I am not contending that the passage of this bill will make conditions better in that respect, although it will in some other respects; but I say that if we do not pass this bill and make this settlement they will get worse, because the finances of the world would be unsettled by demanding the payment of the debt at this hour. I think if we put this debt settlement off for 62 years and fix a reasonable rate of interest, unless there shall occur another great world war in Europe, we will probably collect the debt; but if the settlement is made and conditions become stable, the money markets of the world will absorb it; it will be adjusted and placed. We will adjust ourselves to that condition, and then we will return to a normal market condition for the absorption of our surplus crops in America.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take up the time of the Senate in a debate this morning, and I am not going to do so now. I might talk indefinitely on this question, but it is that of course I think a Senator of the United States should RECORD to let those whom I in part represent know my reasons for voting for this settlement. I wish to say further, however, that of course I think a Senator of the United States should have a vision that is broad enough to represent the entire people of this country; but at the same time, Mr. President, we can not get away from the proposition that we do represent a particular constituency, and my constituency are largely producers of cotton. They produce many other commodities, but when we have a good market for our cotton we have prosperity in our State and when we have a bad market or no market at all for our cotton we have hard times in my State. One-half of the cotton produced in America is sold abroad. Most of it goes to European markets, and a major portion of it goes to English mills; so that, in the last analysis, the owner of the British spinning mills is the buyer of the cotton of the South.

Governmental finance is absolutely tied with personal finance. When a government is under a strain for money loans rates of interest will always go up and the nationals of that government will have to pay higher rates of interest for private loans; that is a demonstrable fact. When governmental loans are easy and government rates of interest for borrowing are low, it has its effect immediately on personal loans, and personal rates of interest come down, and the difficulty of obtaining loans with which to conduct business becomes less—necessarily so, because all the loaners of money prefer to lend to a government rather than to an individual, because it is regarded as better security so far as stable and solvent governments are concerned. So that when the British Government's credit becomes stabilized it stabilizes local banking conditions in Great Britain, it has a tendency to make easier money, and it has a tendency to promote business.

Our people must not overlook the conditions that stare us in the face. The British spinner is a large consumer of American cotton, but he does not sell his cotton products overnight and get the cash for them. He may do so locally to some extent, but the British spinner is a world-wide merchant. He sells in most of the marts of the world, and his basis of making the sales is not 90-day paper, but he sells on a year's time. He takes a year in which to complete his transaction; and the spinners of England have not enough capital to carry the entire products of their factories through a year's time. They are dependent on making loans, or, in other words, on selling the bills payable that they get from the wholesale merchants of South America, Africa, and the Orient in the open bills market of London. If they can not sell those bills payable there, they can not continue to manufacture cotton and sell it in the marts of the world; and whenever the credit of their Government is destroyed or injured or threatened it unstabilizes the market for the British spinner's bills payable in London, and to that extent injures and closes the market to American cotton.

I am talking in regard to cotton merely because that is interesting to my own State; but in the main we can continue this argument and put in place of cotton the wheat of the northwest, the cattle of the great western plains, the corn, or any other product that we produce in America and ship abroad for sale. They are all involved in this proposition.

Within the year, in fact within six months, I have received numerous petitions from farmers' organizations in this country petitioning that our Government do something to establish international credit abroad—for what purpose? For the purpose of establishing a foreign market to absorb their surplus crops. This is only a step. I do not say that it consummates the whole proposition; but making a final settlement of this British debt, putting it in a safe and finally solvent condition, will do more to stabilize the finances of Europe and stabilize the markets of Europe than any other one thing that can be done. I would vote for this settlement from that standpoint even if I thought it was a bad settlement, even if I thought it was an unfair settlement.

I do not think so. I think it is a reasonably good settlement, but if I thought it was a bad settlement I would do it to stabilize to that extent European finances, because I think it is more important to us to do everything we can to establish markets for the growing crops and the product of the toil of American hands of this hour than it is to go back into the past to collect the last dime of interest on a foreign loan. So that even if you had brought in a much less inviting proposition to the Senate, and it was final and a settlement of it, and I thought it was done on fair terms, I would have accepted it, because I think it is the only thing we can do, but I want to be fair and say that I think you have made a reasonable settlement of the matter.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take up this much of the time of the Senate, and I do not wish to go into the matter further. I merely want to let the RECORD show why I think the immediate acceptance of this proposition is in the interest of the great mass of the American people and the particular constituency that I represent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to see this Government drive a harsh bargain with reference to these debts, either the debt with which we are now dealing or any of the debts with which we may hereafter come to deal. I have always looked upon the debts which these governments owe us as a piece of property, as it were, belonging to the people of the United States to be utilized to the best advantage to the people, whether that utilization consisted of generous settlements or even of cancellation in consideration of the return of things which we ought to have.

If the debt question before us be considered purely as a question of collecting or arranging for the collection of so much money, I have no doubt, as stated by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], that a very reasonable settlement has been made; but I have always looked upon these debts as one item, and only one, in the whole subject matter of economic readjustment in Europe.

That phase of the matter, however, I am not going to discuss just at this time; but there is one feature of it to which I am going to call attention. It may not have any bearing upon the question of voting, but it has some bearing upon the historic truth of the transaction which we are now consummating.

Mr. President, I have said I do not want to see this Government drive a harsh bargain. I am equally interested in seeing that we are not unjustly accused of driving a harsh bargain.

I have observed in almost every English publication which has come out since the settlement of this debt what may be regarded as criticism because of the so-called harshness of the settlement. Some of the editorials and some of the press expressions go so far as to say that it is severe and unjust, and call attention again to the attitude of this Government as being that largely of a mere money-making concern when it comes to dealing with other powers. I notice that the ex-Premier of England, Mr. Lloyd-George, stated a few days ago that the American debt-settlement terms were hard, and that he was frankly disappointed in regard to them. That is a mild statement compared to some of the statements that have been made. A great deal has also been said here upon the floor as to the situation in England, as to the unfavorable economic outlook which confronts her, indicating that the settlement might be considered harsh even from our standpoint in view of her unfortunate condition.

I know, as one may know from reading, something about the distressed situation of the English people and of all the people who were engaged upon the allied side, and, so far as that is concerned, of all the people of Europe. Anything that the United States may be able to do in the way of a generous settlement or adjustment of these matters may well take into consideration all such features of the situation. I would deal with Europe with her sad condition in mind.

But I am bound to say that, notwithstanding all these facts, when the whole history is told, this is an extraordinarily generous settlement upon the part of this Government. Never again ought a voice be raised in England or elsewhere to the effect that we are a harsh bargain-driving people. We have acted in this matter, as we did in reference to other matters touching the war, with the utmost unselfishness and generosity. This was a debt incurred for the purpose of carrying on the war, incurred on terms satisfactory to the parties who received the money, and we might well have said that according to the contract it ought to be paid, and still not be subject to the charge which has been made against us; but we have gone much further than that. Holding a debt drawing an interest rate of 5 per cent, we have voluntarily cut it down to 3½ or 3.48 per cent. But that is not, Mr. President, by any means all I have in mind when I rise to discuss the other side of this question as to harshness of settlement.

When we came home from the war we came home without claiming a single foot of territory, without any material or property advantage whatever. Although there was in large measure a continent to be distributed, some of the richest mineral deposits in the world—oil, coal, and other mineral deposits—to be exploited and divided by our allies, as was well known at the time, after the revealment of the secret treaties, the United States did not lay claim to any part or parcel of it. The President of the United States, then Mr. Wilson, stated in the beginning of the war, and stated again and again, and carried into practice at Versailles, the policy of disclaiming upon the part of this Government all possible material advantage; and while the credit is due to him for having said it, it must be said also that the American people supported that contention from the beginning, without, so far as I know, a dissenting voice. There never was in the press or any public speech or any private conversation, so far as I have been able to ascertain, an intimation upon the part of the people of the United States that they desired to secure any material advantage, any property interest, by reason of our victory. We eschewed all gain. We were prepared to do and we did a great unselfish task, and from the beginning to end our action bears no taint of material gain.

To my mind, when the whole transaction is viewed and the environments under which we operated are considered, it was the most unselfish act that ever characterized a nation engaged in a war. Nowhere in the history of the world is there anything to be compared with the doctrine laid down by the President of the United States, supported by the people, and finally ratified by the Government with reference to the unselfish conduct of the United States in that war.

How much better it would have been for the world had that policy been adopted by all the nations interested in the war. In my opinion, the question of economic chaos, of the distress now prevailing throughout the world, and of the dark outlook from the financial standpoint would have been entirely different had that policy been pursued and any semblance of regard given to the rights of nations, not alone those against whom we were fighting but even the rights of those who were associated in the war but less powerful than we.

I am going to call attention to some facts and figures. If it does nothing else, it may help some of us to understand that we are not driving a harsh bargain after all. I trust our friends across the water hereafter may look at it differently also.

Great Britain and France acquired, either absolutely or subject to exploitation, as a result of the war a combined territory of 2,486,000 square miles—within 540,789 square miles as large as continental United States. Of this, England, leaving out Persia for the time being, acquired 1,607,053 square miles, with 35,000,000 people inhabitants thereof. To get some conception of that territory in extent, if we take the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Utah, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, we will have just about the amount of territory included in this area which Great Britain acquired, leaving out Persia. It may be said that some of that territory is a burden. It was not so considered when it was acquired. But within that territory, as I shall show, I think, in a few minutes, are some of the richest areas of the world, and a large portion of them.

Including Persia, over which she now has control so far as exploiting her natural resources is concerned, a country which has an area of 607,200 square miles, Great Britain has acquired, as a result of the war, 2,000,000 square miles of territory. France has acquired 5,605 square miles, with a population of 1,709,746 people, including a piece of territory the richest in industrial possibilities in all Europe, the Saar Valley, for a term of years, which under the present program will not be for a term of years but eternally. She acquired colonial possessions of 480,495 square miles, with a population of 35,773,000 people, making in all a total territory of 2,486,000 square miles acquired by Great Britain and France.

No one can estimate the wealth of this territory. It could not be estimated even at the time of its taking over, and subsequent developments have disclosed that in oil and other mineral deposits it is rich beyond measure compared with its hitherto supposed value. But, as I said, that territory was left to be divided among the Allies. The United States returned home without claiming any part or parcel of it; nevertheless, propaganda, abroad and in this country, has been engaged since that hour in undertaking to demonstrate that the Shylock of the combination was the United States. The reason for such propaganda is apparent. As the able Senator from Massachusetts said upon yesterday, the question is not the condition of our debtor at this present hour but what are her assets?

Let us go a little further and consider the question of the coal and steel possibilities. The exports of iron and steel in 1913 were as follows in tons:

Germany	5,664,000
Great Britain	5,000,000
United States	2,725,000
Belgium	1,543,000
France	573,000

The ore reserves of European nations in 1922, according to the statisticians, are as follows in tons:

France	4,369,000,000
Great Britain	2,254,000,000
Sweden	1,548,000,000
Germany	1,374,000,000
Russia	1,032,000,000
Spain	610,000,000

In other words, the redistribution of the iron and coal deposits since the war has brought about a change of status of these nations with reference to their ore reserves, the value of which, as I have said, can hardly be estimated. I will give an intimation of it. France exported of steel a monthly average in 1912 of 41,500 tons; in 1913, 48,200 tons; in 1921, 100,000 tons.

France obtained from Germany, as a result of the war, 40 per cent of her blast furnaces, 30 per cent of her steel works, and 28 per cent of her rolling mills. Those are matters of consideration in dealing with the equities which arise out of the adjustment of debts, and the settlement of affairs between the allied and associated powers, especially when the driving of hard bargains is the charge.

Let us take the subject of rubber. I read an article written by Mr. Karger, a Washington correspondent well known to all people in the Capital, discussing this subject. He said:

> If the United States is unable to find a way out, the American consumer of rubber will pay approximately $110,000,000 more for the year's rubber supply, with an increase to $135,000,000 in prospect. Rubber in international trade affairs plays a part second in importance only to that of oil; and the United States, as the world's largest consumer of rubber, with its source of supply limited almost entirely to Great Britain's dependencies, is threatened with tremendous penalties as a result of British decision to restrict the output in order to increase the price.
> In September the price of crude rubber was 15 cents a pound. Since then it has gone to 37 cents. Unless an agreement shall come out of the pending negotiations it is expected to remain stationary at about 86 cents.

That illustrates what I have had in mind when I have said that the settlement of the debt problem between this country and the other countries to my mind is but one element in the adjustment of the equities growing out of the conditions resulting from the war. It will not cause Great Britain much difficulty to pay the debt, as it is now distributed, if by reason of her control of the rubber market——

Mr. McCORMICK. And shipping.

Mr. BORAH. And shipping in the view of the Senator.

Mr. HARRELD. And oil.

Mr. BORAH. And oil, and coal, she can raise the price, as she has in the case of rubber, from 15 cents to 37 cents, and put upon us about $135,000,000 a year extra. That is business, and we have no right to complain. We are only enjoined to look into these things when we come to adjust matters with our friends. Much of this is a part of the wealth which was gathered as a result of the war.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have been as active as anyone, I think, in seeking to take measures to free the American rubber consumer from the grip of that monopoly. Surely the Senator does not mean that a monopoly was acquired as a result of the war?

Mr. BORAH. No; what I mean is that a large part of the territory from which different commodities comes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Which part? British Malaysia, which produces the bulk of the rubbber, was under British suzerainty long before the war.

Mr. BORAH. I read further from Mr. Karger's article:

> Which means that rubber tires will cost twice what they did a few months ago. The policy of the British Government was to submit recommendations with respect to the rubber industry to its colonial and territorial legislatures. The recommendations have been carried into effect. They have resulted in an empire-wide combination, which amounts to absolute control of the world's rubber prices.
> Just how seriously the United States will feel the pinch is deducible from the fact that for the year ended July 1, 1922, this country consumed about two-thirds of the world's total rubber supply. Of the total exports of 383,400 tons of crude rubber, the United States took 261,216 tons.

More directly, Mr. President, as the result of the war came the question of the increased possessions of Great Britain with reference to oil. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read, but I ask permission to insert in the RECORD in connection with my remarks some paragraphs from the Literary Digest of January 20, 1923, under the heading, "The world race for oil."

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Ever since the armistice Great Britain has been steadily increasing her sphere of influence and at the same time quietly adding to her great oil resources in this vast territory. The first step was to develop her own oil lands in Egypt, where she has been quite successful. Through the activities of the Anglo-Egyptian Co. she holds the most valuable oil lands of Egypt and has concessions all around the Red Sea. Later, through the d'Arcy concession, she gained the most valuable portion of Persian oil lands for the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. As a result of the Versailles treaty she was granted a mandate of Mesopotamia and with it controlling interest in the Turkish Petroleum Co., holders of an exclusive concession on the whole of that wildcat country. During the present year the Anglo-Persian Oil Co. has been granted a concession on all the oil lands of Macedonia and Thrace by the ex-King of Greece. As a result of this intensive campaign of commercial expansion, the only lands of large proportions left are Turkey, including Armenia, Turkestan, and Arabia, all impossible countries for the production of oil at present.
>
> Since the war the French have made it a policy to befriend Turkey. They have furnished her officers to help in training her armies, sold her airplanes, and sent engineers to assist in building munition factories, and she will expect concessions which the Turks have to offer.
>
> Long debates ensued between the British and the French Governments, and finally Lord Curzon agreed in return for "the renunciation by the French Government of the ancient rights it possessed in the Mosul district," and in consideration of French permission for the building of a pipe line in Syrian territory, that the British Government would hand over to France the 25 per cent German share in the Turkish Petroleum Co. concession. This was a great gain for France, because, according to the soundest estimates, the production possibilities of Turkish petroleum are put at 5,000,000 tons.

Mr. BORAH. Now let us go to another feature of the situation. I have referred to the question of territorial acquisition and the mineral deposits which were acquired along with the territorial acquisitions. I want to refer now to another matter, and that is to some of the payments which have been made to our allies since the war. The amount paid by Germany in cash and kind has been $1,900,000,000; settlements of private debts, $150,000,000; paper marks requisitioned, $140,000,000; paper marks for expenses of armies of occupation, $225,000,000; expenses of the allied commission, $11,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator if he is referring to dollars or marks?

Mr. BORAH. I am referring to dollars.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The New York Times stated the other day that a little over $2,000,000,000 had been paid in reparations by Germany in money and in property, and that the French had expended over $7,000,000,000 in reparations in restoring the country that had been devastated by the Germans. In other words, for what has cost the French people $7,000,000,000 they have only gotten property and money to the amount of $2,000,000,000, leaving $5,000,000,000 unpaid.

Mr. BORAH. That does not controvert anything that I have said and has very little relevancy to the argument which I am making.

Mr. NELSON. It does not contradict what the Senator has said, but the Senator should not overlook it when he refers to the matter.

Mr. BORAH. I can not have in mind everything that is in the alert mind of the Senator from Minnesota. I was calling attention to the fact that the amount paid by Germany was $1,900,000,000; settlement of private debts, $150,000,000; paper marks requisitioned, $140,000,000; paper marks for expenses of armies of occupation, $225,000,000; expenses of the allied commission, $11,000,000; making in all $2,426,000,000. I think that is a fair figure. I have gathered it from the Manchester Guardian, from Current History, published by the New York Times, and from figures which were given by the New York World. Some of them slightly increased the figure which I have given; but as nearly as estimates can be made, I believe that is a fair figure.

Now, it is true that France has expended money for the restoration of the part of France over which destruction flowed during the war. That is not the subject with which I am dealing now. I am simply dealing with the proposition of what our allies have received, while the United States at the same time is being charged with driving a harsh bargain in calling for settlement of a debt at 3½ per cent. It is not all upon one side. We have all lost and all suffered, but when history comes to be written there will be no occasion for charging the United States with driving a harsh bargain with its allies. That kind of propaganda ought to cease in this country, not only among our own people but those who are imported into this country for the purpose of spreading it.

The Senator from Minnesota has said that France has expended $7,000,000,000. France has not done anything of the kind.

Mr. NELSON. I quoted that from as good authority as those from which the Senator has made his quotations—the New York Times.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the Senator did not tell it all. It may be true that France made arrangements to spend $7,000,000,000, but one of the best-informed Frenchmen now living states that about three dollars in five reached the destroyed area, and the rest of it was wasted and grafted by those who were in a position to handle it. It can be demonstrated that nowhere near $7,000,000,000 has been expended. If anyone wants to see the result, let him look at what they have accomplished with the $7,000,000,000. As some one has shown, $7,000,000,000 is more money by twice than was spent in 160 chief cities in the United States in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921. But that is aside from the question. We will take up that question later.

The value of the Saar Valley mines, which they also acquired, has been estimated all the way from $100,000,000 to $250,000,000. The Upper Silesian coal fields which went to Poland were estimated at from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000. The Reparation Commission placed the value of all deliveries in cash and kind of itself at $1,900,000,000. This does not include a number of items since, such as $140,000,000 in paper marks requisitioned and $245,000,000 in marks as expenses of the armies of occupation. A conservative estimate, including payments in cash and kind and territory and coal, has been made at $5,000,000,000 going to England and France since the war.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt, did not the Reparation Commission in December last estimate that the sums which had passed through its hands alone, including the support of the armies of occupation, amounted to $3,000,000,000?

Mr. BORAH. I can not recall the figure. Perhaps the Senator is correct.

Mr. McCORMICK. That did not include State properties and mandated territory and other matters.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Do I understand that the sum of $5,000,000,000 is what has been already received exclusive of landed territory?

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not say that. I said including it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Including all the territory they took?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. That is the estimate which has been made. But, in my opinion, when we come to estimate the territory, the coal, and the mineral deposits, this estimate which has been made by the friends of the Allies of $5,000,000,000 does not represent one-fifth of it. Indeed, it is impossible to estimate the value of the property acquired by Great Britain and France. Well might Curzon say, as he did say, at the close of the war:

> Great Britain has gained in this war all and indeed more than she set out to win. Our navy remains at the end of the war intact and unassailed. The principle of the freedom of the seas, which is the basis of our national existence, stands unimpaired and unimpugned. The British protectorate over Egypt is provided for in one of the clauses of the treaty, and our new possessions are made safe under our command.

Colonel Hilder, in the House of Commons, also said:

> The outstanding feature of the peace treaty is that it puts the British Empire at the highest point that it has ever reached in regard to territorial and world influence. Largely by force of circumstances and the leading part which our navy and army took in either the breaking down or destroying of the enemy we have been left with far greater territory and power than at any other period in the history of our race.

In my opinion, if the wealth which has been gathered up as a result of the war upon the part of our allies could be reasonably estimated, it would be a reasonable figure at $25,000,000,000, if it could be estimated at all. It is like estimating an undeveloped continent. When I say that I include territory and the rich mineral deposits in the territory, the payments which have been made by the Reparation Commission, the value of the coal in the Saar Valley, and of the other coal deposits which have been granted. And now, if my friend from Minnesota will not take offense, France is in the Ruhr at this time because Germany failed to deliver some 84,625 tons of coal and some timber.

Mr. President, I rose for just one reason. I can be brief therefore in regard to it. When the history of this transaction shall have been written from the beginning to the end, the unselfish, the generous course of the United States with reference to the war, its conduct toward its allies, its refusal to claim territory, its refusal to participate in what we might call the spoils of victory, and its settlement of this debt must be set down as among the most generous deeds on the part of a nation in the whole history of the world. No longer should it be said that we are at any time or have at any time been undertaking to drive a harsh bargain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say by way of explanation that the amendment proposes to strike out the provision in lines 10, 11, and 12, on page 3 of the bill, which gives Great Britain the privilege for the first five years of paying only one-half of the interest. That privilege, if exercised, would result in increasing the principal of the debt some $395,000,000, a thing which I think was not contemplated in originally authorizing the commission to fund existing debts. The interest which had already accrued could be put into the principal, but Congress certainly never intended to extend and increase the amount of the debt.

The President of the United States in his address to us stated that the principal of the debt after the cash payment would be $4,600,000,000, but if the clause to which my amendment relates remains in the pending bill and Great Britain exercises her privilege, the principal of the indebtedness, instead of being $4,600,000,000, would be $4,995,100,000. To that proposition I am opposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken in that statement.

For the information of the Senate and at the request of a number of Senators, I want to make a statement with reference to a statement made by me a few moments ago. If the bonds run the full 62 years as provided, and we take into consideration the amount of interest which was paid by Great Britain beginning with the first year on advances made to her, the first one would carry 3 per cent and the latter 3½ per cent. When our first Victory nontaxable bonds were issued they bore 3½ per cent, and following that they were issued at 5 per cent. So that, in order to ascertain the average rate of interest during the whole period, it would be necessary to take the first year average of 3.75 per cent, the second year at 5 per cent, the three and one-half years up to and including December 15, 1922, at 4¼ per cent, then 10 years at 3 per cent, and 52 years at 3½ per cent, making the average rate of interest, if this obligation is carried out to the end, 3.48 per cent plus.

Mr. President, while the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was speaking the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] asked me this question:

> Do I understand the Senator to say that if the bonds which the Treasury of the United States is to accept from Great Britain should pass into private hands, the income from them would not be subject to taxation by the Government of the United States?

I replied as follows:

> Yes; I say the interest upon the bonds would not be subject to taxation under our existing law, and if we undertake to impose taxation upon the interest on foreign bonds, immediately England would impose a tax upon the interest from our bonds owned by her subjects.

I had reference then to existing law which applies to the nonresident alien, and, of course, England would retaliate in such a case; but I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that the interest upon English bonds which an individual American citizen owns is taxable to the American citizen in our country. I thought it was nothing more than right to call the attention of the Senate to that fact, because my answer was rather ambiguous and not altogether to the point.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, while the Senator from Utah is on his feet, I wish to ask him two or three questions with reference to the terms of the pending bill. First, has an agreement been arrived at and put in writing between the American representatives and the British representatives with reference to this loan?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the British representatives, and, I think, the British Government believe that there is no contract nor can there be any contract under existing law until the Congress of the United States finally agrees upon it; but the terms of the proposition that were made to England and accepted by her are included in the bill, with the exception of these words—and settlements, similar, but not more favorable in terms, with other governments indebted to the United States, as set forth in this section, are hereby authorized to be made, subject to the approval of the President.

That provision, Mr. President, was never discussed and never submitted to England and is not a part of the proposition, I will say to the Senator. As I said last evening—I do not know whether or not the Senator from Missouri was then present—so far as I am personally concerned, I should be glad to have those words eliminated from the bill. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has offered an amendment to the bill proposing to strike out those words and to insert another provision with which I am perfectly satisfied, and, so far as I am concerned, I am entirely willing to agree to the amendment proposed by him.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then, if I understand the Senator—I think his statement is perfectly plain and, perhaps, it does not need repetition—the only agreement, arrangement, or understanding of any kind between our representatives and the representatives of Great Britain is found in the language of the bill, which I now desire to read, so that it may appear in the RECORD. After reciting the amount of the principal of the debt, which I do not read, the bill provides:

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until in the sixty-second year the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

The British Government shall have the right to pay off additional amounts of the principal of the bonds on any interest date upon 90 days' previous notice.

Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates on December 15 and June 15 of each year: At the rate of 3 per cent per annum payable semiannually from December 15, 1922, to December 15, 1932, thereafter at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum payable semiannually until final payment.

For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Any payment of interest or of principal may be made in any United States Government bonds issued since April 6, 1917, such bonds to be taken at par and accrued interest, is hereby approved and authorized——

Mr. SMOOT. That is the end of the agreement.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Again, Mr. President, there is not a word said with reference to whether these bonds shall be fully negotiable in their terms, is there?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is not a word said in relation to negotiability.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Not a word is said as to who shall be the payee of the bonds, whether they shall be made payable to bearer or payable to the United States of America?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the form of the bonds has not been agreed upon, but the bonds, of course, will include all of the agreements that are provided for in the bill and prepared by the officials of the Treasury Department, and the bonds will be paid in dollars of the United States in gold.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But that is not stated in the bill, is it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I will say to the Senator that there is no question but what the bonds will be of that character.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am talking now of the agreement which the Senate is asked to ratify. First, there is no statement in the bill as to whether the bonds shall be fully negotiable, so that they may pass from hand to hand by delivery; second, there is no provision that they shall be paid, if I recollect right. I made a mistake once in this body by omitting a clause of a bill, which the newspapers have never got through talking about; so I proceed with some temerity. There is no clause in the bill that the bonds shall be paid in dollars of the present weight and fineness, as we generally find in a bond that a banker takes, is there?

Mr. SMOOT. That will be in the bond, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. But there is nothing in the bill about it. There is nothing in the bill as to the payee, whether the bonds shall run to the United States or run to bearer. There is no understanding about that. But if the bonds conform to the bill, in so far as the bill is specific, the bonds would necessarily have written on their face the condition that the British Government might make payments, which would otherwise be annual, in three-year periods instead of in annual periods, and the bonds, if they carry out the terms of the bill so far as the bill is specific, would contain a provision that Great Britain could pay the holder of those bonds not in money of the present weight and fineness, but with any bond that the United States has issued or may issue subsequent to 1917 during the whole period of the 62 years. That would be true, would it not, I will ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. It would.

Mr. REED of Missouri. So that if the United States were to undertake to sell these bonds to private parties, every private party would take them with notice that he might get his interest once a year or he might get it once in three years.

Mr. SMOOT. That provision only applies to the first five years of the life of the bonds.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Well, let us see about that. I quote:

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods.

That applies to the principal.

The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000.

Does that relate to the principal alone or to principal and interest?

Mr. SMOOT. That relates to principal alone.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It is not so stated in the language of the agreement, is it?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it is provided further along—

For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is an additional right.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but the provision to which the Senator from Missouri has referred relates to the principal only.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is the Senator's inference.

Mr. SMOOT. It says so; it does not say anything else. It says:

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule.

Then as to interest it is provided:

Interest is to be payable upon the unpaid balances at the following rates, on December 15 and June 15 of each year: At the rate of 3 per cent per annum payable semiannually from December 15, 1922, to December 15, 1932, thereafter at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually until final payment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I am perfectly aware of that clause. That clause appears later in the bill. Referring, however, to the language which appears on page 2 of the bill, which reads:

The principal of the bonds shall be paid in annual installments on a fixed schedule, subject to the right of the British Government to make these payments in three-year periods. The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000.

I am unable to deduce from that with any certainty that it applies alone to the principal, although it clearly could be so construed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as a part of the agreement submitted to England, the annual payments are fixed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is what I am trying to get at. Did the commission submit to England something that fixed the annual payments?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly, and they were included.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Where is that paper?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in the RECORD. I put it in the RECORD yesterday, and I will hand a copy of it to the Senator at this moment, if I have it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is the very question I was asking a moment ago.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I had one here. If the Senator will wait a minute, I will get a copy of the RECORD and show it to him.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Is this the place in the RECORD [exhibiting]?

Mr. SMOOT. That is it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That schedule was made up by Mr. Mellon since the British commission left, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It was not.

Mr. REED of Missouri. It was so stated to me, but undoubtedly my informant was in error.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; I will say to the Senator——

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; the Senator from Utah told me a day or two ago that it was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee will address the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I beg the Chair's pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair accepts the apology.

Mr. McKELLAR. I meant no disrespect to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that it is true that this one was made up after the British commission left for England; but it was based upon a cablegram from England to the British ambassador, and he in turn accepted this, and it was a part of the agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I made the statement to the Senator from Missouri which the Senator from Missouri has repeated, and I made it upon the basis of a statement that the Senator from Utah had made to me.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The whole trouble arises from the fact that when I asked the Senator from Utah if anything had been put in writing he said—of course not intending to mislead me at all—that the whole proposition was contained in the bill. If a schedule of payments has been made up and it has been cabled to Great Britain, and Great Britain has cabled back accepting it, that would constitute a written record; and that is exactly what I wanted to find out.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the record in detail of what is found in the bill, beginning on line 13, page 2:

> The amount of the first year's installment will be $23,000,000, and these annual installments will increase with due regularity during the life of the bonds until, in the sixty-second year, the amount of the installment will be $175,000,000, the aggregate installments being equal to the total principal of the debt.

There is one provision modifying that, as was explained yesterday, which says that—

> For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? Then the Senator of course concedes that that table——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Nebraska to ask recognition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thank the Chair. The statement, then, at the bottom of this table, that the principal of bonded indebtedness shall be $4,600,000,000, is erroneous?

Mr. SMOOT. What statement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The tabulated statement put into the RECORD by the chairman of the committee, and presented by the President also, to the effect that the principal should be $4,600,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not. The Senator has not read it all. It says:

> Total principal of indebtedness as of December 15, 1922, for which British Government bonds are to be issued to the United States Government at par, $4,600,000,000—

And that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the bill gives to Great Britain the privilege of adding $395,000,000 to that principal.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the bill gives to Great Britain, if she desires it, the privilege of paying one-half of the interest for the first five years in additional bonds of a similar nature as the original bonds; and it is true that whatever one-half of the interest amounts to during the first five years would be an additional loan to England not from money advanced by our Government but taken out of the interest that she would have paid to our Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; so the Senator admits that the principal debt would be increased $395,000,000 if Great Britain should exercise that option.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not figured out the exact amount. It will be whatever half of the interest for the first five years may be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can say to the Senator that it is $395,100,000, as I demonstrated here yesterday. Therefore that $395,100,000 must be added to the $4,600,000,000 if we are to compute correctly the principal of the debt.

Mr. SMOOT. If England takes advantage of the privilege that is given her under this provision, the debt will be increased by whatever one-half of that interest may be. There is no question about it. I think the reason for that was explained in detail, and I think it was a very wise provision under the conditions existing in the world to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the Senator from Missouri has finished, I should like to find out a little more definitely how that was brought about. As the Senator stated yesterday, it certainly was not in the original contract with Great Britain, but was an afterthought, brought in by the British ambassador, and conceded by the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I stated to the Senator yesterday all that there was to it, and I am perfectly willing to state it to the Senator again whenever he wishes me to.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator has referred to the schedule prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and accepted by cable from Great Britain, which specifies the amount of money which is to be paid each year. Those different payments are based upon the principal debt as it existed in December, 1922. Suppose, however, that Great Britain takes advantage of the deferment of one-half of the interest, and adds that to the principal, giving new bonds therefor, will not that necessarily increase proportionately each of these annual payments?

Mr. SMOOT. It will, just as stated here; but the principal of the deferred interest will fall due within the 62-year period.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is not the point I am making.

Mr. SMOOT. It will increase the amount of the indebtedness to America after December 15, 1922.

Mr. REED of Missouri. And it throws this entire schedule of annual payments out of gear—that is to say, it will increase each of our annual payments of principal.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; it means that the payment will be made one-half in cash and one-half in bonds. In other words, the annual payments will be made just the same; the amounts will be paid just the same; but for the first five years, if England wants to take advantage of the privilege granted her, she can give us one half in cash and the other half in bonds similar to the bonds that she has already given us, and that is the payment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I quite understand that; but the Senator has not caught my question. It is provided here in this schedule, for instance, that, we will say, the seventh year there shall be paid in principal $27,000,000. That $27,000,000 is a certain proportion of the debt as it existed in 1922; but in the meantime one-half of the interest has accumulated and has been converted into bonds. Therefore, that payment of $27,000,000 will have to be increased, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President, and in the same proportion as the debt is increased; but this says upon the basis of the debt of $4,600,000,000 as of December 15, 1922.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I understand that. The only thing I want to know is if it is not true that, should England take advantage of this proposition and defer the payment of her interest for five years as to one-half of the interest, and thereby increase the principal, this will necessarily increase all of the payments which are to be made from year to year during the 62-year period?

Mr. SMOOT. Not on the bonds as they were issued, but upon the extra bonds that will be issued, and the total of the two bonds will be more than is stated here, necessarily so, because they must all be paid within the 62-year period.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator says "not upon the bonds that are to be issued," but there is nothing said as to those bonds. They will become a part of the principal debt. I mean, there is no such condition as the Senator puts into his statement contained in this document.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it says here—

> For the first five years one-half the interest may be deferred and added to the principal, bonds to be issued therefor similar to those of the original issue.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Exactly. Then they become a part of the principal; and the amount of money which Great Britain must pay us each year will not be the amount stated in this schedule, but will be a larger amount, dependent upon the amount of bonds she issues for the deferred interest. So that the United States can not follow this schedule, and nobody buying these bonds to-morrow can follow it——

Mr. SMOOT. They will be a different series of bonds, and the payments on these bonds will be made just exactly as stated here. The bonds which may be issued for the interest will be another series of bonds, and if the Government ever did dispose of them—which, I will say, I do not think the Government ever should do—the purchaser would know what the bond provided. The bond would be in payment of the interest.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have the Senator's view on that. We are going to take a bond from Great Britain. We are going to write into the face of that bond, first, that for the first five years only half of the interest need be paid and that Great Britain can give us bonds in lieu of the other half. Of course, the Senator will agree with me that that bond is absolutely non-negotiable, in the practical sense.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then we are going to write into this bond the further condition that it can be paid in the bonds of the United States of any issue which may be put forth subsequent to 1917, and we are going to put that on the face of the bond. Then we are going to put into the bonds the provision that Great Britain can take up any of this indebtedness in any of the ways we have indicated at any time during the period of 62 years, so that she can mature these bonds overnight if she sees fit.

Does the Senator imagine the United States Government could negotiate those bonds and get the money out of them unless they were enormously discounted, because of these unusual and unprecedented conditions which are to be written in their face?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in my opinion the bonds would not be sold unless the Government of the United States guaranteed the bonds, naturally so, if the Government of the United States sold them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Why should we guarantee them?

Mr. SMOOT. They are our bonds, and if we are going to sell them, I think more than likely there would be at least a moral obligation of redemption if anything should ever happen to impair their value; but nothing will ever happen, in my opinion, that will prevent England from paying the bonds under the terms proposed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Does anybody know of any banks which have written their guaranty across the back of any ordinary, negotiable Government bonds of Great Britain, or Germany, or France? Does anybody know of any banker who has ever taken a bond of the kind proposed here, or any international financier who has done so, or anybody else who has ever taken a bond of this kind in the history of the world? I know of no such instance.

Mr. President, I am not prepared at this moment to discuss this matter as I would like to, but I want to challenge the attention of the Senate, so far as it is present here, to the fact that this ties the United States to the fortunes of the British Empire for nearly two-thirds of a century of time.

Mr. SMOOT. No more than it would be tied if we simply had the "I O U" of the British Government.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Not nearly as much. They owe us that obligation now, and we are tied to them now, if we ever would be tied.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I can not agree with the Senator. Great Britain owes us to-day a certain sum of money, every cent of it is due, and we have Great Britain's solemn obligation to pay that money. We are told that it amounted to $4,604,128,085.75 on the 31st day of December, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not taken the credits off. It is $4,600,000,000.

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; it says "to be paid in cash," but it has not been paid yet. I am talking about what she owes us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated that this ties us to the British Government for two-thirds of a century. I think in a sense that is true, but unless we assume that Great Britain is prepared to pay the debt at this time, any form of a settlement would necessarily involve that, would it not?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Not for 62 years; and, as I shall try to show, this settlement could be made and ought to be made so that the United States could entirely relieve herself from that.

There has been much loose talk in newspapers, and some of it by British negotiators, if the newspapers themselves are to be credited, to the effect that the United States is driving a very hard bargain; that we are a sort of an international Shylock; and that Great Britain is paying us her debt. There is an old, stale joke which has been laughed at, I suppose, through the centuries—it may have been perpetrated in the Garden of Eden—of the fellow who owed another man money and executed his promissory note, and then sat back with an air of great satisfaction on his face and exclaimed, "Thank God, that is paid." What we are doing to-day is permitting Great Britain to exchange one kind of a promissory note for another kind that we now hold and to greatly reduce the interest rate; to extend a demand obligation into a debt that will not be fully satisfied until two-thirds of a century shall have rolled away.

If the distinguished British statesman and financier who came here could have looked forward to the way this proposition is being received, I would not have wondered if he had referred to the fact that the Senate of the United States was largely composed of men from the suburban districts, who did not know very much—at least about finance.

When I read his statement I could not help remembering another scene, when, shortly after the United States had concluded to enter the war, a body of distinguished British statesmen stood on the floor of this Chamber, headed by, or at least embracing, a great British general, a man of magnificent physique and of splendid and heroic record, who impressed me at the time as the finest type of the soldier I had ever seen, flanked on either side by distinguished British diplomats and statesmen, asking us, if we were coming, to come quickly, and asking us to send our boys over there to help stop the retreat toward Paris. I did not expect from an official of that Government which then appealed to the farmer, granger, or suburban element of this Senate for aid a sneer at us when we asked her for a settlement.

I want to exonerate the British people from any responsibility for that kind of a sentiment, for I hope it does not exist. Generally speaking, Great Britain has selected at least gentlemen to represent her in international negotiations.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. It is only fair, is it not, to state in that connection that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Baldwin, made a public statement, which was printed at the request of the ambassador from Great Britain, in which his position was really stated, and he denied at least a part of the statement that was published in the English press. I think it is fair to him to call attention to that statement, issued in answer to charges which were made even here upon this floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I know what the press carried originally, and I know I waited five days for a denial and did not see it.

Mr. SMOOT. Longer than that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have heard a rumor since that that he said the statement was not exactly correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. He said it was informally given out.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Or that it was informally given out. I do not say this to arouse any animosities. I want to get back to bedrock on this question, and when we get back to bedrock we find that we made a contract with the American people, and under that contract, with reference to which the British Government was fully advised, we obtained the money and made the loan, and it is as morally binding upon Great Britain as it is on us. We, the Government of the United States, did not have this money. We were ourselves confronted with the enormous expenditures of a war upon which we were about to enter, or had in fact entered, and it was necessary to get money, not from the Federal Government but from the people of the United States. So we passed a law authorizing the sale of bonds to the American people, and authorizing the use of $10,000,000,000 of those bonds as loans to foreign countries, and that was all done at one time, before a bond had been sold. In that act we provided:

> That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act, to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign governments held by the United States shall be by such foreign governments converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

And upon that we went to the American people for the money. We employed everybody from McAdoo to Mary Pickford, or from Mary Pickford to McAdoo—and I speak of them both with the utmost respect and kindliness—everybody from statesman to moving-picture actress. Hundreds of thousands of volunteers all over the country, on every husting, on every platform, from the steps of the Capitol, from the stages of the theaters, in country press and elsewhere, told the American people that the money we were going to get from them to loan to foreign countries would be loaned upon bonds that would mature when our bonds matured and would bear the rate of interest our bonds bore, so that whatever money we thus loaned would come back to us and not be a burden upon the taxpayers of the United States.

Moreover, we told them that if we ever had to pay a greater rate of interest than the amount that was being then paid the foreign governments by their bonds would be obligated to pay a like rate of interest. Thus one hand was to wash the other. Thus the taxpayer of the United States, whether the poor woman bending over the suds in her tub, whether the banker behind his counter, was given to understand that so far as the foreign loan was concerned we never would have to tax the people of the United States to pay it. That was the contract with the people of the United States, and any attempt to repudiate it would be as disgraceful a proceeding as ever was engaged in by any government of earth.

Now, let us see what happened. We went to the people and said, "Subscribe for bonds, buy, buy, buy, until you are bled pale, to get the money to carry on the war, and $10,000,000,000 of it is to be loaned to foreign countries to aid them."

The foreign countries stood here by their representatives declaring that they could go no further—that they must have the money, and with it they must procure supplies. Now, in what a spirit of thankfulness they accepted it at that time! They gave us a general obligation in writing which recited the terms and conditions of the act which I have just read to the Senate, and which they solemnly agreed upon their national faith and honor they would observe. Then, as they drew money from time to time they issued their obligations, their promise to pay, for the several amounts of money they received. Their solemn obligations are deposited in our Treasury, and they are as binding to-day as on the day they were executed. What is proposed to be done is not to pay those obligations, but to exchange those obligations for a different obligation.

Repudiation? If a country were willing to repudiate, it could just as well repudiate a promise to pay that was engraved on a piece of paper printed in green or red ink as it could a promise to pay that was written out upon a piece of legal cap and solemnly signed and filed in the Treasury of the United States. If there is to be repudiation, let us have it now. But if we are to approach the question as we ought to approach it, on the principle that here is a great creditor desiring to be fair with a debtor and a debtor who is impelled by a sense of honor and duty and by honest desire on his part to meet his obligations—if we are to approach it in that way, which is the proper way—let us weigh the question upon its merits.

First let me brush aside, if I may, some of the arguments we have heard here. It has been advanced that Great Britain does not really owe this money, because instead of getting cash to carry over to Great Britain she simply received credits here and bought goods with them. Let us examine that argument. That was one of the conditions under which she got the loan and, therefore, it is binding upon her and as an honorable nation she would not, if I may use a slang expression, do any "welching" on that proposition. But let us see if she was harmed in any way. The distinguished Senator who reported the bill, and for whom I have the highest regard and as much affection as one man has a right to have for another man, answered his own argument when he said that at the same time that Great Britain was expending, in the purchase of supplies here, the $4,000,000,000 of money which she had from our Treasury, she was expending in the purchase of supplies here $3,000,000,000 of other money. What do the two statements mean, then, except that this was the place she had to come to get her supplies anyway, and that she suffered not one whit when she was requested to expend with us the money she had from us, because she already was driven to this market and had to expend with us $3,000,000,000 of money which she secured elsewhere? She came here because she wanted our goods. This was the cheapest market. She would not have bought a pound or shilling's worth here if it had not been the cheapest market.

So, the sentimentality sought to be injected here is scarcely worthy the consideration of anybody. But if it were to be considered, how would we adjust it equitably? Here was a citizen working at his trade who denied himself to buy a bond. Here were millions of people all over the United States, the girl behind the counter working for a meager salary, the farmer in his field, the mechanic at his forge or bench or in the mill, the soldier in the trenches, all purchasers of the bonds. They loaned the money. Without their sacrifices and their contributions the loan to England would have been impossible. What profit to them that some war contractor made profits out of their money which Great Britain borrowed from their Government? What right have we to say to our people who took the money out of their earnings in the first instance, "Our Government should accept less than real payment because Contractor A and Contractor B and Trust Magnate C got a very large price for what they furnished"?

There is only one way to consider the question, and that is as a practical financial problem wherein we have a responsible debtor, an honorable debtor, to deal with, but a debtor who will do just what Great Britain has done at every stage of her history—make as good a bargain as possible. And for that I do not criticize Great Britain or the British people.

Approaching the question in that light, remembering that we have demand obligations now and that we have been extremely lenient in the matter of insistence upon payment, that our executive officers, without authority of law, have seen fit to commit our Nation, as far as an unauthorized agent can commit anybody, to the policy of deferring payment of interest, substantially all of it up to the present time, let us consider the kind of contract we ought to make.

In the first place, I insist, Senators, that the highest duty we have to our country is to remove a condition which unites the interests of the United States and the interests of Great Britain in such a way that injury to the credit of Great Britain would injure the credit of the United States, and to do that just as quickly as possible. If the Government of the United States holds in its Treasury ten or twelve billion dollars of British bonds, then every difficulty in which the British Nation may be involved, whether it be economic, springing alone out of business conditions, or whether it should arise from some great world conflict, would affect the credit of the United States tremendously.

If the British Empire should begin the process that some people predict, and which I mention only by way of illustration, of disintegration 40 or 50 years from now, if there should be a tremendous conflict in that empire and her resources should be taxed, the cry would be made in America that our interest was affected to the amount of the loan then existing; and if it were $5,000,000,000 or any other sum the insistence would be that our Government should throw the weight of its influence with the British Government in order to maintain the stability of that Government and thereby insure the payment of its debt. Pass this bill in its present form and we tie Great Britain and the United States together, in this one important respect, at least, for two-thirds of a century of time; our Government, as a Government, becomes interested in the maintenance of the British Government and in the maintenance of the credit of the British Government.

Senators ask me how that is to be avoided. My good friend the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked me if, in effect, we were not already there. We are already there. One thing I wish to see come out of this settlement more than anything else is to free ourselves from that condition. It can not be done under this agreement because of the stipulations which are to be written in the face of these bonds, as I elicited in the colloquy with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. A bond can not be put upon the general market and sold at anything like its face value unless that bond has a fixed time to run, unless the period of maturity is within a reasonable time limit, and unless the payment of the interest is stipulated to be at fixed periods and at a fixed rate. Neither can such a bond be properly negotiated if it is made payable to a Government, as the Senator from Utah says the British bonds will be, and therefore they could only be negotiated by act of law and possibly by the assumption of responsibility on the part of the United States.

What we ought to have here, regardless of the rate of interest now, is the bond of Great Britain maturing within a reasonable period of time and payable to bearer, so that it may be negotiated. Then what our Government, as a prudent Government, ought to do would be to hold those bonds until the money market would afford an opportunity of sale at face and interest, then dispose of those bonds as rapidly as possible, and use the proceeds to redeem the bonds which we issued in order to obtain the money to loan to foreign countries. Suppose that were done. It is easy to conceive that within 10 or 15 years' time we might dispose of all those bonds; our obligations to the American people could be reduced by some $5,000,000,000; the collection of interest would cease as to that amount; and we would no longer be tied to Great Britain by such a condition as is here created. If Great Britain ever felt disposed to demand further time, we should be relieved of that importunity being laid at our door, and she would fund her bonds in the usual way, by going into the markets of the world and selling them. All this is aside from the question of interest.

I insist that it is a menacing thing—and I insist that it is a menacing thing with all kindliness of feeling toward the British Goverment—for the United States Government to continue for a long period of years to be the direct creditor of the British Government or of any other government. We have no right to be in the business of loaning money to other governments or to private parties. It is not a proper function of government. It was admissible because of the hard exigencies of the World War, but with the war over, we should set our house in order and get back to that complete independence of our Government of another which existed prior to the war.

More than that, I most solemnly appeal to Senators to have some regard for the possible conditions of the future. I do not stand here as an alarmist or as one desiring to stir up any feeling against another great country, but we know that in the exigencies of national life the unexpected is the thing that frequently happens. Who, except a very few wise men, would have said five years before 1914 that there would have come this great world conflict? What man would have dared to say that America would be drawn into it? Who, then, would have prophesied that we would be struggling with a national debt of the present huge proportions? And who, now surveying the troubled surface of the world, can give bond as to what may happen in the future?

Mr. President, we talk about preparedness for the evil day. Let me tell you something that is better than cannon, better than navies, more powerful than marching armies; it is credit. A great, wealthy nation free of debt, owing nothing, situated as we are, can fight a great war better because of that condition than she can with a great navy or a great army and an enormous debt. I want to see the United States free of the last dollar of debt; and I want, therefore, to see these foreign debts put in such shape that they can be negotiated and absorbed by the financial markets of the world, the money put into our Treasury, and our obligations taken up and canceled.

Mr. President, I asked a moment ago, Who can look into the future? The suggestion of war between the United States and Great Britain may shock our thoughts to-day. So war between the United States and Germany would equally have shocked our judgment if it had been prognosticated in 1910 or 1911 or 1912. We desire the good will of Great Britain. We desired the good will of Germany. We desire the good will of all the nations of the earth; but, sir, the man is not fit to call himself a legislator who does not try to protect against all contingencies. Suppose that we should have a great difficulty with Great Britain at some time; suppose we were at war with Great Britain, and we started in with the British Government owing the American Government ten or twelve billion dollars, or any other huge sum. Immediately that part of our resources would be cut off; immediately we would be as though we had lost that sum of money; it could not be employed, and our credit would be impaired, because the bonds that we gave to receive that money would still be outstanding. On the other hand, if we cut this financial cord that binds us, we can get these bonds in such condition that they can be gradually sold on the markets of the world. Then in the case I have supposed—a case which I hope will never arise, but which may arise—we will find ourselves with our own debt canceled, to the amount at least of these bonds, and a conflict with Great Britain would not affect our credit, except as all conflicts affect the credit of a nation.

What moral right have we to vary the terms of the original contract? The British Government ought to give us its bonds maturing as our bonds mature and bearing the same rate of interest. That is what they agreed to do. That is what they solemnly signed on paper they would do. Now it is proposed to relieve them of that obligation.

Mr. President, those who propose this measure say: "Why, this is all right. We can fund our debt at 3 per cent." How do they know we can fund our debt at 3 per cent? Can you fund it at 3 per cent to-day? You know you can not. The Washington Post of this morning gives the prices received for United States bonds, as follows:

3½ per cent Liberty bonds	$101.78
Victory 4¾ bonds	100.20
United States Government 4¼ per cent bonds	100.00

Every other bond of the United States is below par. When, however, you come to Canadian bonds, they run 100⅝, 101⅛, 100½; and only one bond, the Canadian 5's, that mature in 1952, the longest running of their bonds, is 99⅜.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the interest rate?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Five and five and a half per cent. That is a point I am going to dwell on in a minute.

When you come to the British bonds, their 5½ per cent bonds maturing in 1929 are 115¼, and their 5½ per cent bonds maturing in 1937 are 103⅜. The longer the bonds have to run, the smaller the premium, as shown here in these lists.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do.

Mr. DIAL. I am asking the Senator for information: Would the objection that he raises to disposing of the bonds be obviated after five years?

Mr. REED of Missouri. No; because the bonds will have written into them the proposition that they can be paid in United States bonds.

Mr. DIAL. So that they are not strictly negotiable bonds?

Mr. REED of Missouri. Yes. They will have written into them the proposition that Great Britain can mature them whenever she sees fit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in that connection let me ask the Senator a question: This would result, would it not? Suppose we could, as claimed here by some, hereafter—say in 10 years or 20 years—refund our present 4¼ per cent bonds at 3 per cent. Great Britain would get the advantage of it under this agreement by simply buying our bonds and paying in them.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. But we would get our money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us see whether we would get our money or not. I think it is a very doubtful proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

Mr. REED of Missouri. "We would get our money," says the Senator. The implication is that there is some doubt about our getting our money.

Mr. SMOOT. At as early a date as that.

Mr. REED of Missouri. If the doubt exists, it will exist just as much after Great Britain signs a bond to substitute for her present written obligation as it does now. Either she is honest and going to pay, or she is bankrupt and a defaulter. I do not think she is either bankrupt or a defaulter. I say, for the credit of the British nation and the British people, that they have the reputation of paying their debts.

Great Britain is not bankrupt; but if she is there is no use in taking her notes, for we already have them, and no statute of limitations is going to run against them. They owe this money. They come in here and propose a 3 per cent loan for the next 10 years, with a right to defer the payment on a part of that. This is the time when they are paying 5 per cent and when we are paying 4¼ per cent; and during that period, when interest rates are bound to be high, these shrewd Englishmen have fixed the lowest rate on their bonds. That is when they are to get 3 per cent money, when nobody else can get it at 3 per cent. Then, after that period, when money may possibly go as low as 3½ per cent, they begin paying 3½ per cent; but during that period of 10 years, almost as certainly as fate itself, we shall be obliged to pay 4¼ per cent for our money. So that England makes by that one transaction the interest on over $4,000,000,000 for a period of 10 years at the rate of 1¼ per cent, and then afterwards if money goes below 3½ per cent she can buy up our bonds and pay this debt with them, or she can refund her own debt. Such a bargain I can understand a banker might make on one side of the table—and I do not speak disrespectfully of bankers—or a pawnbroker, with a farmer on the other side; but I object to being on the farmer's side of the counter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to suggest to the Senator this mistake that I think he has fallen into: He said that the British commission had made this proposal to us. As I understand, it was the American commission's proposal to the British, and the British accepted it, so they claim now.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I can understand that, and if I had time I would go into it. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has been fixing this job—I will call it by the name of "job"—for months.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I do not want him to lay this on the Secretary of the Treasury. I am just as much responsible for this as the Secretary of the Treasury is, and I have been in no job, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Oh, the Senator has not been responsible for the job. If he is in a job he is the jobbee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the statement he has made is an unwarranted one as against the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I shall have something to say about the Secretary of the Treasury a little later on. I can not do it to-day, because I see I shall have to quit; I have an engagement to keep.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Treasury is only one out of five.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Secretary of the Treasury came before Congress and demanded the right to settle all these loans as he saw fit; and when we got him before the Finance Committee, as I shall show from the record, and tried to get him to tell us what he proposed to do, we could get nothing out of him; and all the way through his attitude was that not of a man who expected to insist upon full and absolute payment of these debts, but of a man who proposed to compromise them.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to allow whatever he has to say on this debt by way of criticism to apply to me just the same as it does to anyone else. I say to the Senator now that I think this settlement is fair and just to the United States and to Great Britain.

I think it is the best settlement that could possibly be had. I do not speak now for Great Britain. I speak for the Government of the United States. I speak for the economic conditions of the world. I say that if this settlement is finally consummated it will mean more to the world than any conference that could ever be held, and it will say to all the peoples of the world that the two great English-speaking nations want to be fair to one another and want to assist in upholding the commerce of the world and in bringing about normal conditions in the economic world.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I know the Senator from Utah thinks he is doing the right thing. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has been able to convince the President and a lot of other people on these financial problems. The trouble is when they deal with him they are dealing with a man who has thought in dollars and cents all his life, and he can go around any one of them like a cooper around a barrel and talk figures to them until I think he gets them befuddled and bemazed.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am concerned, of course, I deny that. I think I know just as much about figures and the conditions in the world as the Secretary of the Treasury does.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Of course the Senator thinks that, and on any other question than money I will pit the Senator against the Secretary of the Treasury. Certainly the Senator would not be befuddled if he were not in exactly his present frame of mind—absolutely certain that he is not befuddled. I am going to say something about that phase of the matter to-morrow if this debate lasts that long. I have taken all the time that I can take now, because I am bound by an engagement to aid a delegation of Missouri citizens in a hearing before the Secretary of War.

This may be the best settlement we can ever get. That may be true; but if it is the best settlement Great Britain will make, then Great Britain has repudiated her solemn written obligation.

If Great Britain is presently distressed for money, I am willing that reasonable extension shall take place, but I am not willing that we shall, by virtue of such a contract as this, relieve her of her written obligation and pay the difference out of the money of the taxpayers of the United States. I am not willing that we shall accept and put in our Treasury bonds that are substantially nonnegotiable, so that the United States Government shall be the creditor of the British Government, and for 62 years we shall be tied to the fortunes of the British Empire.

The skids may be well greased to speed this scheme through the Senate. Every international banker who owns a British bond will be for it. Every paper that is influenced by them will support it. But you will not find those bankers who took the bonds of Great Britain refunding them on any such terms as this. You will not find any of the great financiers who are concerned so greatly in the credits of the world reducing their obligations to any such dirty piece of paper as this will be. I say "dirty piece of paper" in the sense that it is not a fully negotiable bond, because there have been written into its face so many conditions that it is an unmarketable bond. But they will all be anxious to have the United States postpone the day of payment for 62 years, or 62 centuries, for that matter.

We paid our shot in the war. When we owed anything we had to pay in cash one hundred cents on the dollar. We paid France $234,000,000, and much of it paid as rent for the soil on which the feet of American soldiers stood when they held back the great tide of Germans as they rolled on toward Paris. We have paid England $394,000,000, and of this sum $00,000,000 was the charge for hauling troops across the ocean to fill gaps in their lines and to enable Haig to rescue himself after he had cried out in the agony of his soul, "Our backs are to the wall. Britons, stand and die!" We paid because it was one of the obligations we had incurred, and they will pay as an honorable nation.

It will be said that this is the only contract submitted to us. It is submitted to us without reference to the law of Congress, in defiance of the instructions of the Congress. We appointed agents, and we wrote the bounds and measures of their authority in the law. They proceeded outside that authority, and the British Government knew they were proceeding outside of it. There is, therefore, no obligation, express or implied, moral or otherwise, resting upon this body to approve this proposal.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the commission, in my opinion, was not violating the law. They have made no contract other than subject to the action of Congress. If Congress does not approve this bill, nothing will come from it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. That is what I said. I did not say the commission violated the law. I said they proceeded outside of their authority, and therefore they could not bind anybody. I did not say they had done anything wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. I misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. REED of Missouri. The Senator did misunderstand me, and I want him to understand me correctly.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator's pardon; I misunderstood him.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interjection?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have finished.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that not only did the contract to which the Senator referred state the terms of our debt and the rate of interest to be paid, but the fact that this country itself, during the war, in incurring the indebtedness with Great Britain, was taxed by Great Britain at the rate of 5 per cent upon that debt, so that Great Britain herself charged this country 5 per cent interest on our indebtedness.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harreld	McNary	Shortridge
Bayard	Harris	Moses	Smoot
Brookhart	Harrison	Nelson	Sterling
Broussard	Heflin	New	Sutherland
Calder	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Swanson
Cameron	Johnson	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Underwood
Couzens	Kellogg	Owen	Wadsworth
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed, Mo.	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Reed, Pa.	Weller
George	McCumber	Robinson	Willis
Gooding	McKellar	Sheppard
Hale	McKinley	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PROPOSED CHANGE OF PRESIDENTIAL AND CONGRESSIONAL TERMS.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, yesterday, when we were considering the joint resolution brought forward by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I thought there would be a vote on Senator HARRIS's amendment to make the terms of President and Vice President six years and make them ineligible for reelection. This was not done. We left out the best provisions. We should have changed the terms of Representatives to four years. I think we should have also extended the terms of the President and Vice President to six years, and provided that they should be ineligible for reelection. I trust the House may give the matter careful consideration and endeavor to amend the resolution in those respects.

It occurs to me that if the President of the United States were elected for a term of six years it would tend very much to stabilize the business of the Government and we would get better government. I feel that our country is drifting a good deal toward Bolshevism and unrest. I believe that an amendment to the Constitution along the line suggested would do more than anything else to make the Executive independent and to give us better government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I have listened with a good deal of pleasure to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I agree that it would be well to have the presidential term six years, making him ineligible for reelection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no use to apply such a provision to the present President, because he will be ineligible anyway.

Mr. HEFLIN. I agree that the people will take care of that next year.

Mr. President, I am opposed to electing Members of the House for four years. Jefferson had the correct idea about that. The House of Representatives ought to be kept very close to the people. A Member of the House ought to have to go every two years to renew his commission at the hands of the people whom he is supposed to serve. I served in the House for a number of years and we used to discuss that question among ourselves. Although it would have been more convenient for me to have a four-year term instead of a two-year term, I believe that the adoption of the suggestion would be a dangerous change in our Government, because I think the Member of the House, who must go back every two years to consult his people, is as a result kept in very close touch with them.

I have seen Members in this body in my day get very far removed from the people in four years' time. It is all right to have a Senator elected for six years, but let us keep the Members of the House going back every two years for reelection of the membership of the House. If we should make the terms of Members of the House four years and of Senators six years, we would be getting the Government a little too far removed from the people.

WORLD WAR FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President and Senators, I wish to state in a very few words why I intend to vote for the pending bill. It seems to me, sirs, that it is the best settlement we can get of a very troublesome question, one which, I think, will help materially to steady the affairs of a sorely harassed and troubled world. I shall not attempt to discuss the details of the measure. That has been done already by others much more familiar with it than myself, and I believe these details are fully understood by the Senate.

In my judgment, Mr. President, we should consider a number of things in voting on the measure. One of the most important is the circumstances, or conditions, under which the loan was made. We were then engaged in a terrific struggle with the forces of Germany and her allies. The greatest war the world has ever known was in progress, and America was intensely interested in the outcome. Our allies needed financial aid—needed it badly—and we extended that aid, with the proviso in this instance, if I remember correctly, that the money loaned to Great Britain should be expended in the United States in purchasing war supplies. The money was so expended. The prices charged in many instances for these supplies were very high, and, of course, we got a big return from the excess-profits taxes paid by the people who furnished them.

While Great Britain was decidedly more interested in the outcome of the war than was the United States, I take it that we were vitally interested also. Suppose the loan had not been made. Suppose we had not gone into the struggle as an ally of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium. Suppose our united forces had not succeeded in repelling the German assaults. Does anyone doubt the ultimate outcome of the war? Does anyone doubt that Germany would have won it but for our intervention? Does anyone doubt that we, alone and unaided, would have been obliged to contend with Germany after she had destroyed her foes?

Our contribution to the war was the financial and military aid extended to our allies in defeating Germany and maintaining free institutions. While maintaining freedom abroad, however, in conjunction with our allies, we were maintaining free institutions at home. It was a cooperative effort of the most important character, and, sirs, we should not overlook that fact when we come now to the collection from our allies of the money loaned them under such circumstances. They were fighting our battles as well as their own. It makes me feel a great deal more kindly than I would if this were a clean-cut, cold-blooded business proposition of money loaned. It is not such a proposition at all. It was a patriotic thing for us to lend the money. It was in the interest of America, as well as in the interest of our allies, to lend that money.

Now, sirs, it seems to me that a pretty good arrangement has been made. I had the honor on the 11th of last November, Armistice Day, to deliver an address under the auspices of the American Legion at the city of Homer, in my State. At that time I suggested a settlement which would not have been as favorable as the one here proposed. I said it would be entirely satisfactory to me, as one Member of the United States Senate, if Great Britain should pay us a sum equivalent to 4 per cent per annum on the full amount for a period of 50 years. This would have meant payments of about $184,000,000 a year for 50 years, or a total of $9,200,000,000. If Senators will look into the pending settlement, they will find that it is nearly equivalent to 4 per cent per annum for a period of 62 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not.

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; it is. It is about 4 per cent per annum for 62 years, if I know how to compute interest, I will say to the Senator, and I think I do. That statement has been made repeatedly, and I have not heard anyone question it. The Senator can make his own calculation, however, and correct me if I am wrong.

There is no objection particularly to the proposed arrangement, so far as I have heard stated, except to the rate of interest. It is urged that we are giving the British a much better rate of interest than our own people are receiving. Senators, we ought not to insist upon a pound of flesh in this matter. We ought to consider the very distressed condition in which the whole world is to-day, including Great Britain. If we get back every dollar of the principal, and interest from the present time at the rate of 3 per cent per annum for 10 years and 3½ per cent per annum thereafter, it should be entirely satisfactory to us.

Some Senators say, "Our own people are paying 4½ per cent, and it is wrong to give these foreigners a lower rate of interest than our own people." Senators, let me remind you that we have no means of enforcing this obligation against Great Britain if she should see fit to repudiate it. No one would contemplate going to war to enforce the collection of this debt. Great Britain honestly owes us the money. It would be national dishonor of the highest character for her to refuse to pay it, and she never will refuse. But we have no practical means of enforcing it. It is entirely different from an ordinary obligation in our own country, where we have the means of enforcing its collection. That fact deserves the closest thought.

Another consideration was eloquently brought out by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and I believe it has great force. He reminded us that in 1927 we can retire, if we wish, something over $3,268,000,000 of the second Liberty loan bonds; that in 1928 we can retire, if we wish, something over $3,439,000,000 of the third Liberty loan bonds. He predicted that within 10 years we will refund a large part of our present bonded indebtedness on a basis of 3 per cent per annum instead of 4½ per cent. I see no reason why the prediction should not come true.

In my judgment, there never was a greater period of prosperity in America than the near future holds for us. We are on the verge of the greatest prosperity we have ever enjoyed, and I am convinced that we can refund our bonded indebtedness on the basis of 3 per cent interest, and then, instead of the British paying a smaller rate of interest than our own people pay, they will be paying a greater rate of interest, for after the lapse of 10 years the British rate of interest due would be 3½ per cent. I predict unhesitatingly that this Government can get money in the near future at 3 per cent. So it seems to me, Mr. President, there is nothing in that argument.

Now, what would happen if we do not approve of the settlement? It has been made deliberately, after the greatest study and the most painstaking consideration, by representatives of Great Britain and the United States, the two great English-speaking nations, the most powerful nations in the world, between whom a debt was incurred in their joint enterprise when they were allies of the closest kind. Suppose we refuse to ratify this settlement which our former allies have told us is the very best they can do, what effect would it have on mankind? What would the people of Belgium, of France, of Italy, and of all Europe say? Would it not be most discouraging to them? It seems to me, sirs, that it would discourage them terribly; that, in the slang of the day, it would give a "very black eye" to international affairs.

The world is groping, and has been groping for nearly four and a half years since the Great War closed. It is time, Mr. President and Senators, for the United States and Great Britain to come to some kind of adjustment, to get back to normal, to put the war behind us. This agreement with England, under which we shall receive so much per annum in definite payments for 62 years, the payments so adjusted that she can meet them without destroying herself, seems to me will set the pace for the balance of the world. When we make this settlement with England, in my judgment, France will feel that she must go and do likewise, or relatively so, and Belgium and Italy will probably reach the same conclusion. It will be a starter; it will be a beginning; and I am convinced that the effect upon the world will be magnificent.

Mr. President and Senators, I represent in part an agricultural State which is devoted largely to the production of cotton. I do not claim to be a prophet, but, in my humble opinion, when this bill shall have been passed and the matter involved shall have been definitely settled, it is going to have such a stabilizing effect upon business between the United States and Great Britain that within 48 hours from the passage of the bill the price of cotton will go up materially. The English consume an immense quantity of the cotton of the United States. On the other hand, if this session of Congress should adjourn without passing the bill—if we adjourn on the 4th of March and the idea spreads abroad throughout the world that the United States has refused to make this fair and just settlement; that we are quibbling over the question of interest; that Congress will not meet again until next December, nine months from now—I fear the effect will be bad; I fear the troubled waters will become more troubled and not be quieted. We need something to quiet the world, and not to excite it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated that we are merely quibbling over interest. I think he has forgotten some of the other objections which have been raised here to the bill.

In the first place, Great Britain is to pay in bonds that are not negotiable and which can not possibly be disposed of or assigned by the terms which she injects into the bonds.

In the second place, Great Britain asks us to give her the right to increase the principal of the debt by $395,000,000. That is an important thing. Certainly Congress never intended that the principal, which the President mentioned as being $4,600,000,000, should be increased to $4,995,000,000, and yet that is contemplated in this proposed legislation. It was not originally contemplated, and was not originally in the contract which was made between the representatives of Great Britain and of the United States, but it has been injected into the bill. Those are additional questions to be considered.

Mr. RANSDELL. So far as the nonnegotiability of the bonds is concerned, that does not trouble me at all, because if England can not pay her debts I do not know what nation can. We have got to depend upon the reliability of England. She has never defaulted, so far as I know, for many centuries in paying her obligations. I can not, therefore, see that there is anything in the world in that objection. It is not a valid one.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. Now, let me answer the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator does that, will he yield?

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator recall the fact that we now hold the obligation of Great Britain to give us negotiable bonds?

Mr. RANSDELL. Can the Senator tell me how we can enforce that obligation unless we shall go to war in order to do so?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not talking about that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am talking about something practical. The Senator from Nebraska wants the ideal, while I want the practical. I desire to get the best thing I can. I am willing to accept the practical and the Senator from Nebraska wishes the ideal, and that is the difference between us.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No. The Senator asks me how we can enforce the present obligation?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes; I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask him how can we enforce the obligation which he proposes to secure from Great Britain?

Mr. RANSDELL. We shall at least put it in a very much easier form for Great Britain to meet. If one tries to make a man pay a great deal more than he possible can pay, he will say, "Why, you are trying to destroy me, and I am going to fight you"; but if he is given a good long time and the payments are divided up into quite a number, so that he can meet the obligations from year to year, courage will be put into him, he will then try to meet them, and he will in most instances meet them. Great Britain can not pay all this money now, and personally I would not wish her to do so. In my opinion, it would be a misfortune for this country to receive all of this money right now. It would unsettle our national finances. However, we can not make Great Britain do anything, unless we go to war with her, which is unthinkable.

The Senator from Nebraska asks what assurance we would have about the payment of the installments. I can only say that the installments would be so modest, so small, compared with the great financial responsibility of the British Empire, that I can not believe she would default in them. They are on easy terms, and I think can be met without any serious trouble. As it is now, unless we do make them on easy terms, Great Britain will not try; she will simply say, in the language of the day, "Gentlemen, crack your whip; get the money if you can." And we can not do it.

We have no other creditor of whom I know who has made any serious effort to pay us. Great Britain is the only nation that has done so, if my information is correct. We ought to be thankful to her for trying to pay us. I feel grateful to Great Britain for showing a willingness to pay us. It has been my experience that when I have had a debtor who has tried to pay and was short of money I helped him; but if he does not try I will not help him. Great Britain is the only country that is making any effort to pay, and she should be encouraged.

In regard to the other part of the Senator's question, I admit the situation is a little bit awkward; but the amount of interest which may be funded seems small to me compared with the very large amounts which are involved. The total sum is $4,600,000,000, and if Great Britain is permitted to hold back the payment of the interest for a period of five years, and if that holding back amounts to $395,000,000, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], it will not be such a tremendously big thing as the Senator indicates. It will merely mean that Great Britain will have a right to hold that money back but will have to pay us interest on it at the rate of 3 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For how long?

Mr. RANSDELL. Until it is paid, I suppose. She has got to settle within that period of 10 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely wrong. That shows that Senators do not stay here and listen to the discussion. When they assert that this is merely a quibbling over a small rate of interest they are talking entirely outside of the facts. This is a serious matter; it is an attempt to incorporate in the agreement with Great Britain something that was not in the agreement as originally made.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not in it as originally made.

Mr. RANSDELL. As to the $395,000,000, the only effect would be that for a period of five years we would get only 3 per cent interest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Again the Senator shows he does not understand the case.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to have the wise Senator from Nebraska correct me. I will listen to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will tell the Senator what is correct. It is provided in the bill that deferred interest amounting to $395,000,000 shall be put in bonds exactly like the other bonds, running perhaps for 62 years; so that interest to that amount becomes incorporated with the principal, and it runs just as long as any part of the principal runs.

Mr. RANSDELL. I did not understand it in that way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought so.

Mr. RANSDELL. Possibly the Senator is right. I do not say that the Senator is right merely because he makes the assertion, for I have heard Senators make assertions on this floor when they were mistaken sometimes. Perhaps the Senator is right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator who is in charge of the bill finally admitted that I was right, and that the $395,000,000 becomes a part of the principal, making the total principal $4,995,000,000 instead of $4,600,000,000.

Mr. RANSDELL. If that is the situation, possibly we ought to correct it; but the Senator and I are not going to fall out by reason of what I consider a relatively immaterial consideration. It certainly can not amount to very much, and if we are going to get the money ultimately all it could amount to would be that Great Britain would not pay that money when it falls due but would be permitted to pay interest of 3 per cent per annum thereon and ultimately pay the whole of the principal. That is all it could amount to, and that ought not to be enough to cause very much trouble between us and the British.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said yesterday, they will pay 3½ per cent after 10 years on the amount of deferred interest, for which we take new bonds. It simply means that instead of paying the full amount of interest falling due the first five years they may pay one-half of it in cash and one-half of it in bonds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah will also admit that this was a subsequent matter arranged by the British ambassador after the British Government had already cabled to this country an acceptance of the proposition as originally made?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to take the time to explain that matter again at this time. I explained it yesterday. The acceptance was in principal. There has been no change in the rate at all, but the request was made that we allow one-half the interest for the first five years to be paid in bonds instead of cash.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Louisiana will allow me further——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Utah, in his testimony before the committee, went so far as to make the statement which I am about to quote. The statement was in answer to a question of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who asked:

> Senator LA FOLLETTE. This was the second proposition which the American commission submitted?
> Senator SMOOT. Yes; that for the first 10 years the rate of interest would be 3 per cent, and for the 52 years thereafter the rate of interest would be 3½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually. That was a flat proposition, with no other provision. And that proposition was carried to England by the English commission. It was presented to the English premier and council. They accepted that in principle, as the cable stated.

That proposition is what the American people think is before the Senate now, namely, to take a principal of $4,600,000,000 and each year to pay the interest on it and each year to pay a part of the principal on it, so that the total capital debt carried will be $4,600,000,000; but this other suggestion has been injected into the bill since that time merely on the request of the British ambassador. I say that it amounts to an additional loan of $395,000,000 to the British Empire, and that the commission was not authorized to make additional loans to the British Empire or to any other Government.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong when he says that it was at the request of the British ambassador. The British ambassador did present the request at the request of the Premier of Great Britain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it was after the cablegram had been received accepting the American proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. But they had accepted it only in principle. I have said that a dozen times on the floor of the Senate; and that meant that they could request that half of the interest for five years be paid in bonds if England desired it.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate further, except to say that it seems to me the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is really making a mountain out of a molehill. I can not see anything very important in this matter except the difference of one-half of 1 per cent interest for a limited length of time.

Just a few words more, and I will close.

I merely wish to add, Mr. President and Senators, that when this loan was made to Great Britain there was absolutely no partisan politics connected with it. We were all struggling together here as Americans, trying to win the great World War. We worked together as one man, and among other things that we did we extended this great loan to Great Britain. I am happy to say, Mr. President and Senators, that so far I have seen no partisanship in the adjustment and settlement of this matter. We seem to be treating it as American Senators, looking to the greatest good not only of our own country but of humanity; and I believe that when the vote comes this bill will pass overwhelmingly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that from and after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, February 15, 1923, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the pending bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am sure that it is not possible to enter into an agreement to vote at any time to-morrow. There are a number of Senators who have expressed an intention to discuss this bill. There is not the slightest disposition upon the part of any Senator with whom I am in communication to delay a vote on the measure beyond the time necessary for a fair and full discussion of the questions involved in it. According to the information which has reached me, I think it entirely probable that debate may be exhausted and a vote reached some time during Friday, certainly not later than Saturday, of the present week. I think an agreement touching the subject may be reached, but that it would be well to let the matter go over until 11 o'clock in the morning, at which time it may be taken up and, in my opinion, a time can be fixed to vote.

I make this suggestion for the reason that some Senators are not present who are interested in the time that shall be fixed, if any, and it will be difficult to procure their attendance just at this time. I myself would suggest, if it meets with the approval of other Senators, that the time set forth in the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Utah be advanced one day, so that the limitation on debate which he provides may go into effect at 2 o'clock on Friday and that a final vote may be taken some time during Friday.

I think that would afford a reasonable time to conclude the debate, and I think all Senators will agree that not the slightest disposition has been shown upon the part of any Senator to delay the consideration or disposition of this measure. At the same time it is recognized to be a matter of the very greatest importance, and for that reason I do not think an effort ought to be made now to preclude full and fair discussion of the subject. My proposal would contemplate an adjournment or recess at the usual hour.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may add a word to what the Senator from Arkansas has already said, I think, perhaps, something along that line can be done, but I hope the Senator from Utah will not make the request this afternoon. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was called to the War Department, I believe, and said that he would like to be heard on the matter. I think there is no disposition to delay the bill beyond a reasonable time for debate. There are several Senators who want to speak on it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think there would be ample time, even though we did not hold a night session, if we met to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock and met again on Friday at 11 o'clock?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to meet to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock; but I ask the Senator, in view of the absence of the Senator from Missouri, to let his request go over until to-morrow at 11, and I think we can agree then. I do not see any reason why we can not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I supplement what I have said with the further statement that I think it fair that Senators who are not here, who are to speak upon this subject, may have an opportunity of being present when the agreement is reached? I have not the slightest doubt from the information now in my possession that an agreement can be reached when the matter is taken up again in the morning at 11 o'clock; but I feel that an opportunity to consider the subject should be afforded Senators who desire to debate the measure.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to accede to the request of the Senator that the time be fixed at 2 o'clock on Friday, so as to extend the time one day. I have no disposition at all to crowd the consideration of the bill. I had hoped, however, that we could go along without a night session.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I say to the Senator from Utah that in my judgment there is not the slightest justification for a night session under the conditions which exist, and that an attempt to hold night sessions would in all probability work such a disarrangement of plans among Senators that it would protract rather than shorten the time when the bill may be finally disposed of. This measure came into the Senate for consideration yesterday. The entire day was consumed by Senators who are on the committee, and who are familiar with the facts in connection with the negotiation of the settlement. Considering its importance, and the progress which has been made, I feel sure that there can be no ground for the slightest complaint on the part of any Senator as to the prospect of an early disposition of it; and my reason for asking that the final disposition of the unanimous-consent agreement go over until to-morrow at 11 o'clock is that Senators who are interested in the subject, and who are not here, may feel that no advantage has been taken of their absence.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I had no idea of doing that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am perfectly sure of that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say again that I think the Senator's proposition is a fair one. I wanted, if possible, to reach an agreement so that we would not be compelled to hold a night session.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is impossible for us to hear the debate over here.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, my suggestion that the matter go over until to-morrow carries with it the implied suggestion and understanding that no night session will be had to-night. Of course, if no agreement should be reached to-morrow, the Senator would then be at liberty to pursue the course which in his judgment he thinks advisable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, Senators would like to hear this colloquy. Will not Senators please speak loud enough so that we can hear them?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that notice was given that we would hold a night session to-night, but there will be no necessity of that if we can agree upon a time to vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I understand perfectly well that the notice of an intention to hold night sessions was given for the purpose of inducing an agreement, and I realize that if the Senator doubts the good faith of those who assure him that a speedy disposition of this matter may be had he may proceed in that way, if he thinks it is the best way to secure action.

I am perfectly sure, however, and I think the Senator will agree with me, that an attempt to hold night sessions now because an agreement is not entered into the second day that this measure is under consideration when a delay touching the agreement is asked in order that Senators who have expressed a desire to be present when it is considered may do so will not be calculated to facilitate the business of the Senate. It never has done it, and in all probability it would not do it in this instance. I am perfectly sure that an agreement may be reached in the morning at 11 o'clock, and I should prefer that the matter go over until that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I will withdraw the unanimous-consent request. Then we can perhaps get in touch with some of the Senators who are absent from the Chamber at the present time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator bring it up to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, so that all Senators can be here?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like very much to get in touch this afternoon with some of the Senators referred to by the Senator from Arkansas, and then perhaps we can reach an agreement later in the afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator can, of course, pursue any course that he desires. I think the suggestion that the matter be considered pending, and that it go over until the morning, is a reasonable one, and I prefer to take that course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Arkansas feels that there is a reasonable certainty that we will be able to agree to-morrow to vote some time on Friday.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I should be willing, so far as I am concerned, to enter into the agreement now, but I would not like to preclude other Senators from the opportunity to express themselves touching the agreement, the subject not having been presented to them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I make no question whatever of the good faith of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, at this hour I would not want to agree to a vote before Saturday. I may feel differently to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the other day while the shipping bill was pending—I have not charge of the unfinished business now, but of course the Senate knows that I am interested in the shipping bill—I gave notice that I should ask for a night session to-night. Of course, later the debt bill was taken up. It was taken up on my motion. That displaced the shipping bill. Of course, the debt bill is the unfinished business now. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] on yesterday gave notice that a night session would be had to-night. I want to do whatever is best to facilitate the business of the Senate. I am no more concerned in any of these measures than any other Senator. I am not any more responsible for their success or their failure than any other Senator.

I have my interest, which I conceive to be simply the interest of the public in the disposition of these measures. I know that the time is getting short. I am not unacquainted with the fact that the days are passing by, and that the 4th of March will soon be here. I also recognize that every day that elapses before the shipping bill comes up makes it that much easier to defeat the shipping bill, if Senators are disposed to use the time for that purpose.

I think I appreciate the situation here in the Senate, however, with reference to holding night sessions. As I said the other day, I do not want the Senate to hold night sessions; I would not like to have the Senate do it. I did not give notice of night sessions as a threat, as was suggested a moment ago, to force an agreement upon any measure. I gave it simply because I felt that the time of the present session is so short that it is absolutely necessary, for the proper consideration of the measures which are pending, to hold night sessions. Of course, conditions might develop so that we may feel we shall have to hold night sessions for some other purpose, for it does seem to me that with the measures we have pending, it is absolutely necessary, in order to give them proper consideration, that we should hold night sessions, and that we ought to do it; and that we could well afford to meet earlier in the morning, and give our time to the consideration of these measures, so that they may have full and proper consideration. I know that we could not have a quorum here to-night if Senators are determined not to hold a night session to-night.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think, from information which comes to me from some of the Senators among the minority members of the Finance Committee who are interested in this measure, that if the Senator from Utah would propose a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at 2 o'clock on Saturday, it could be disposed of without any opposition. If he feels that he must try for a vote on Friday, then I think we ought to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, and let the matter go over until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I say now, and not in a spirit of trying to force Senators to do this or that, that I am not willing to allow this bill to go over by unanimous consent until Saturday. If Senators force it over until Saturday, that is something over which I have no control.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator consent to the request made by the Senator from Arkansas to let it go over until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am coming to that in a moment. Every Senator, of course, will do what he feels to be his duty in passing on the question as to whether it shall go over until Saturday or not. So far as I am concerned, I shall not consent to have it go over until Saturday for a vote. If it is delayed until Saturday, I can not help it.

I am willing, under the circumstances, to let the matter go over until to-morrow, without insisting upon a night session to-night, that we may see if it is possible to arrange so that we can vote either to-morrow or on Friday, and of course if we reach an agreement then we will probably avoid a night session to-morrow night; but I can not give my consent to anything further. I am merely acceding to this situation without in any way consenting to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I shall ask that it may go over until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. That suggestion is my own, and the arrangement suits me.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I ask that it may lie on the table and go over until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The proposed unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that from and after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. to-day (Thursday), February 15, 1923, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the bill (H. R. 14254) to amend the act entitled "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes," approved February 9, 1922, nor more than once nor longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATEMENT RELATIVE TO MR. STANLEY BALDWIN'S INTERVIEW.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD the request for publicity made by the British Embassy for a statement with regard to the interview reported in the press as having been granted by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with regard to statements he was alleged to have made in relation to the Congress of the United States.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The British Embassy requests publicity for the following statement with regard to the interview reported in the press as having been granted by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at Southampton on his arrival there last week:

Telegraphic inquiries made by this embassy in London show "that Mr. Baldwin did not grant any interview to any representative of the press.

"On arrival he was surrounded, however, by ten or a dozen reporters, who asked innumerable questions, to some of which Mr. Baldwin replied informally. The impression which his answers created in the mind of the editor of an important London daily newspaper is indicated by the following editorial comment:

"'The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a statement to the press about his debt-funding mission to the United States. We do not disagree with his argument, although it makes him look more like an American emissary than a British chancellor. If he would do as much to explain the British position to America as he is doing to explain the American position to Britain he might then be a useful public servant.'

"The remarks attributed to Mr. Baldwin in certain organs of the American press—that the debt had got on the nerves of the American people and that Congress would not be willing to eat its own legislation—are without discoverable foundation.

"Mr. Baldwin neither criticized nor aspersed any section of the American people. On the contrary, he sought to express his great appreciation of the kindness and courtesy which were extended to him throughout his recent visit to this country."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to know if there is any other Senator who desires to speak this evening? If not, as an executive session has been requested——

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is now a quarter of 5. There are some Senators who have some measures they would like to call up, and it seems to me it would be very well to allow them to use the time now to get those measures up. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has a measure to present that is very pressing. It seems to me there are more Senators here now than are usually in attendance at this hour.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the Senator that I have always objected to taking up bills on the calendar at this time of the evening, because we are supposed to call them up in the morning hour. Of course, to pro forma bills I do not object, but it is too late an hour for us to take up real legislation. I have no objection to it coming up in the morning hour, or in the hour which corresponds to the morning hour when we take a recess.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is a very reasonable man. I think he is one of the most reasonable men in this body. He can look around now and see that we have a larger attendance than we have at almost any time during the morning hour unless a quorum call is made. We are nearing the end of the session.

There is business on the calendar which must be pressed to the exclusion of other matters. I do not know whether there would be any objection to the measure which the Senator from Delaware wants to bring up. I anticipate that when it is explained there probably will not be any objection to it. It does seem to me that it is not unreasonable to request that those matters should be considered, especially when we see so many here, and that is the only reason why I speak about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not anything new for me to make the objection I have just spoken of. A man who is watching legislation has a right to believe that when the morning hour closes important legislation will not displace the unfinished business, and I do not think it is right to take up real legislative matters at this time in the evening. Everyone who is watching a bill is put on notice that he will have to be here at 11 or 12 o'clock, when the Senate meets, whether it is in executive session or not, and I have no objection to bills coming up at that time. I object less to the consideration of bills than any other Senator, I venture to say.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that; the Senator is very reasonable.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not object to bills being called up in the morning hour, but I do object to calling them up at this time of the evening, unless they are bridge bills or some formal matters. I do not object to that kind of a bill being called up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The measure the Senator from Delaware wants to have considered is not general legislation, and I hope that he will have an opportunity to present it, at any rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I happen to know what the measure is. It is merely a formal matter. It is of the same character as a bridge bill, and I have no objection to its consideration; but I want to say that I shall object at this time if any bills of a legislative nature are brought up.

CONVENTION OF MYSTIC SHRINE.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on the District of Columbia House Joint Resolution 418, authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia, and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant permits to Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), for the use of any parks, reservations, or other public spaces in the District of Columbia under his control on the occasion of the forty-ninth annual session of the Imperial Council, Ancient Arabic Order Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, in the month of June, 1923: Provided, That in his opinion such use will inflict no serious or permanent injuries upon such parks, reservations, public spaces, or statuary therein; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate, for such and other purposes on the occasion before named, such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the said District of Columbia under their control as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands, arches, or platforms that may be erected on the public spaces aforesaid, including such as may be erected in connection with any display of fireworks, shall be under the supervision of the said Almas Temple Shrine Committee and in accordance with plans and designs to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, and the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds: And provided further, That the reservations or public spaces occupied by the stands or other structures shall be promptly restored to their condition before such occupancy, and the said committee shall indemnify the War Department and the District of Columbia for damage of any kind whatsoever upon such reservation or space by reason of such use.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to loan to the said committee such tents, camp appliances, and other necessities, hospital furniture and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the United States as in their judgment may be spared at the time of the session: Provided, That the said Shrine committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage to such tents, appliances, etc., as aforesaid not necessarily incident to such use: And provided further, That the said committee shall give approved bond to do the same.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are authorized to loan to the said committee such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., belonging to the United States (battle flags excepted) as are not then in use, and may be suitable and proper for decorations and other purposes, which may be spared without detriment to the public service, such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., to be used by the committee under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by the said Secretaries, or either of them: Provided, That the said committee shall, within five days after the close of said session, return to the said Secretaries all such ensigns, flags, decorations, etc., thus loaned; and said committee shall indemnify the United States for any loss or damage not necessarily incident to such use.

SEC. 4. That the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, is hereby authorized to permit the use of any or all public parks, reservations, or other public spaces in the District of Columbia for use by said committee for parking automobiles, the temporary erection of tents for entertainments, hospitals, and other purposes; and said committee is hereby authorized to charge reasonable fees for entertainment and accommodations on said parks, reservations, or other public spaces to aid in meeting the necessary expenses incident to the session.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit said committee to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports, wherever necessary and in the nearest practicable connection with the present supply of light, for the purpose of effecting special illumination: Provided, That the said conductors shall not be used for the conveying of electrical currents after June 10, 1923, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the public spaces, streets, and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before June 15, 1923: Provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced; that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public; and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: And provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removing of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia, and that if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illuminating or other purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervision of the officer in charge of said park or reservation.

SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to grant, under such conditions as they may impose, special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia during said session, and to charge for such privileges such fees as they may deem proper.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the telegraph and telephone companies to extend overhead wires to such points as shall be deemed necessary by the said committee, the said wires to be taken down within 10 days after the conclusion of the session.

SEC. 8. That the Public Buildings Commission is hereby authorized to assign to said committee for use and occupancy during said session such unoccupied public buildings in the District of Columbia as, in its discretion, may appear advisable: Provided, That any and all buildings so assigned shall be surrendered within 10 days after the close of the said session: Provided further, That the said committee shall furnish a bond or other satisfactory assurance of indemnity against damage to said property while in its possession, incidental wear and tear excepted.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I offer, to be added as a new section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. The Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia shall not hereafter have or exercise power to fix rates of fare for the street railway companies in the District of Columbia at rates in excess of the rates of fare fixed in existing charters or contracts heretofore entered into between said companies and the Congress; and from and after the passage and approval of this act the said street railway companies shall receive 5 cents per passenger as a cash fare, but they shall issue and sell six tickets for 25 cents, as provided in existing charters.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not offer that amendment now, and I will state the reason why it should not be offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has already been offered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I allowed the joint resolution to come up as a measure merely providing for the use of parks, and so forth, during a convention here. There is no legislation in it. Of course, the amendment the Senator offers is the most important kind of legislation, and more than that——

Mr. McKELLAR. I want a vote on it. We all understand how we are going to vote. It has been debated. This will probably give me the only opportunity of having the matter voted on at this session, and I am inclined to insist on it. So I have offered the amendment. Let us vote on it one way or the other. If the Senate votes it down, let it be voted down; and if it is voted up, it will be a part of the joint resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not care how meritorious the Senator's amendment is, is he willing to stand in the way of the request of the Shriners?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I have no objection whatever to that. I am very much in favor of the Shriners having this privilege.

Mr. DIAL. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will withdraw his amendment and let us pass the joint resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very much in favor of the joint resolution, and have no objection to it whatever and shall vote for it. All I ask for is a vote on my amendment.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, this is a House joint resolution. There are a number of Senate bills on our calendar. If the Senator from Tennessee desires to have his amendment voted on, he can offer it as an amendment to some Senate bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that, but this measure is going to be passed at this session, and the bills to which the Senator refers may not be passed at the present session, and I may not be able to get my amendment through on any of those bills. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Senate votes upon the amendment I want to call attention to the rates charged on the street railways in the largest cities in Alabama and Tennessee. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read them, but I want them to go into the RECORD. I ask that the letter I hold in my hand may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to it's going into the RECORD. It has been in the RECORD before.

Mr. SMOOT. This one has not been. It is more extensive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may say that there is a bill now pending before the Legislature of Tennessee to abolish the public utilities commission in that State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the letter presented by the Senator from Utah?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 31, 1923.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: During the course of the debate in the Senate on the District appropriation bill for 1924 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 25, p. 2376) the Senator from Alabama, who was speaking in favor of a 5-cent fare on the street railway lines in the District, was asked whether the street-car fare in his State is 5 cents or higher.

The following rates in the largest cities in Alabama are quoted from the latest information before the commission:

Birmingham: 8 cents cash, 15 tickets for $1; 2-cent transfers.
Mobile: 7 cents cash; 5 tickets for 30 cents.
Montgomery: 8 cents cash; 16 tickets for $1.
Alabama City: 7 cents cash; 16 tickets for $1.
Albany: 8 cents cash.
Decatur: 7 cents cash.
Gadsden: 7 cents cash; 16 tickets for 90 cents.
Selma: 7 cents cash.
Anniston: 6 cents cash.
Tuscaloosa: 6 cents cash.
Florence: 10 cents cash, 6.4 cents for tickets.
Huntsville: 10 cents cash.
Sheffield: 10 cents cash, 6.4 cents for tickets.

The rates in the State of Tennessee in cities of 25,000 or more population are as follows:

Memphis: 7 cents cash.
Nashville: 7 cents cash, 5 tickets for 85 cents.
Knoxville: 6 cents cash.
Chattanooga: 7 cents cash.

In view of the prominence given to the discussion of local street railway fares, I thought you might be interested in having this information.

Very truly yours, C. KELLER,
Chairman Public Utilities Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. Has the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is absent on account of sickness. He is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I voted under a misapprehension. My pair, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—25.

So Mr. McKELLAR'S amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BALL. I move the indefinite postponement of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 266) authorizing the use of public parks, reservations, and other public spaces in the District of Columbia; and the use of tents, cots, hospital appliances, flags, and other decorations, property of the United States, by the Almas Temple, Washington, D. C., 1923 Shrine Committee (Inc.), and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment Senate Joint Resolution 279. I ask that the title be read, and I then expect to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read by title.

The READING CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 279) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan 3,000 wooden folding chairs for the use of the United Confederate Veterans at their reunion to be held in New Orleans, La., April 11, 12, and 13, 1923.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, under such regulations as he may prescribe, 3,000 wooden folding chairs to William M. Garic, of New Orleans, La., for the use of the United Confederate Veterans at their reunion to be held in New Orleans, La., on April 11, 12, and 13, 1923.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution if it should not contain the usual clause relating to some bond to be given or responsibility to be assumed for the safe return of the articles loaned?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The joint resolution contains the usual phrase "under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe." That permits him to impose a bond.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would assume that he has that authority?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STANDARDS FOR FRUIT AND VEGETABLE HAMPERS AND BASKETS.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4399) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I inquire of the Senator if the measure involves a legislative matter?

Mr. McNARY. I will state to the Senator that a similar bill has passed the House. I want, for the benefit of the consumers of the country, to get the bill through the Senate before final adjournment. I know of no legislation on the calendar which contains more merit than this measure.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To what does it have reference?

Mr. McNARY. To the fixing of the size of hampers for the carriage of vegetables and of baskets that take care of fruit, so that no fraud may be perpetrated upon the public.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that I have no objection to the merits of the bill, when taken up at the proper time, but I know very well that there will be a contest this evening if it is brought up. I therefore ask for the regular order.

Mr. McNARY. Do I understand that the Senator from Alabama objects to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For the time being. I would not do so to-morrow morning, but I do object now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I had intended to move to take up for immediate consideration a bill now on the calendar. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if he would object? It is a small claim bill, to pay $800 to a man who lost his foot in the Government service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt that to-morrow morning I shall most cheerfully vote with the Senator for the payment of the claim; but if we would take up one such measure now, we would have to take up others. Therefore I demand the regular order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 15, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thou alone art holy, perfect in power and in charity. As Thou art our loving heavenly Father, we pause, as Thou dost make daily provision for us. Impress us with the three great notes of our relationship, which are love, obedience, and service. Always help us to be true, for there are those who trust us; enable us to be strong, for there are those who need us; ever keep us pure, for there are those who care. The Lord bless the Members and officers of the House of Representatives and be gracious and merciful unto all their families. Bless our country and may Thy reign soon extend unto the ends of the earth. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Committee on Agriculture was called.

BUTTER.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12053) to define butter and to provide a standard therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on Wednesday last an amendment was pending, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, that amendment was read for information, was it not?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I recall the situation. The point of order was made that there was no quorum present, while the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] was on the floor delivering an address in support of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair is inclined to think there is no quorum present.

Mr. HAUGEN. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 240 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Last Wednesday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] offered an amendment, which is pending and which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOIGT: Page 1, line 9, after the word "fat," insert a comma and add "all tolerances having been allowed for."

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, when this bill was up last week I offered an amendment which has just been read. The purpose of this amendment is to provide that 80 per cent butter fat in butter shall be the absolute minimum in the administration of the law. A great many States in the Union have a standard of 80 per cent; a few States have a higher percentage. The States of Wisconsin and Minnesota have a fat standard for butter of 82.5 per cent but they allow a tolerance of 2½ per cent. That means that in these and other States no manufacturer of butter can go below 80 per cent without violating the law.

When our committee reported this bill I was for it, but some months have elapsed and I have received considerable new light. The bill, as it has been reported by the committee, provides, among other things, that butter shall contain not less than 80 per cent by weight of milk fat. It has been customary all over the country in the administration of food laws fixing a minimum standard to allow a tolerance below that minimum. Let me briefly illustrate that. Suppose in a State having the 80 per cent minimum a man makes butter having 79 per cent fat and he is prosecuted. The judge and the jury will say that the man has come close enough to the standard prescribed by law or by the regulations and they will find that man not guilty.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I can apprehend that a jury might do that, but is it customary for judges to do that?

Mr. VOIGT. A judge might not do so, but a department official having to do with the enforcement of a minimum standard would probably not prosecute a man who came within 1 or 2 per cent of the standard fixed. What we fear is that if you prescribe a minimum that in the administration of the law tolerances will be allowed. If that is true, and tolerances should be allowed, a great many States of the Union are going to be put to a disadvantage because their laws are such that you can not go below 80 per cent. All that my amendment does is to make sure that no tolerances shall be allowed under the 80 per cent. No honest manufacturer of butter can object to that amendment.

Mr. ARENTZ. You are placing no burden on the butter manufacturer but only assuring the consumer that he shall not pay 50 cents per pound for water?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes; I want the manufacturer to be honest in putting 80 per cent butter fat into his butter. I do not want any loophole in it so that a man can sell water for butter.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does any State have a law making 80 per cent butter fat the minimum with 2 per cent tolerance?

Mr. VOIGT. The State of Wisconsin and the State of Minnesota have taken care of the proposition in this way, and I believe it is the best way. Their statutes fix the standard at 82.5 per cent, but in order to get 80 per cent they allow a tolerance of 2½ per cent.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LEA of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I yield.

Mr. LEA of California. To what extent is butter sold on the market containing less than 80 per cent butter fat?

Mr. VOIGT. I can not answer that question.

Mr. LEA of California. Is it commonly sold?

Mr. VOIGT. The common practice is to sell butter containing 80 per cent butter fat, but every once in a while a manufacturer is jerked up by the Internal Revenue Bureau or by the Agricultural Department for having less than 80 per cent butter fat or having more than 16 per cent water.

Mr. LEA of California. Is that based on weight according to the State law?

Mr. VOIGT. It is, and it must be because butter fat weighs less than water, and if you had it by volume instead of weight, you would have less butter fat and more water.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The State of Ohio has no law with reference to it.

Mr. VOIGT. I believe that is right.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If this law is passed it would affect Ohio if the butter went into interstate commerce.

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I yield.

Mr. PURNELL. Does the gentleman think it is possible for the butter manufacturer to keep the content at 80 per cent?

Mr. VOIGT. Does the gentleman mean is it practicable?

Mr. PURNELL. Is it possible? In other words, does the gentleman think that if we do not write this amendment into the bill that men will purposely fix the butter content below 80 per cent?

Mr. VOIGT. There are manufacturers of butter in this country who make butter in large quantities who can regulate the butter fat in butter within one-tenth of 1 per cent, and if these men are given a leeway to bring it down to 78 per cent or 77½ per cent they are going to do it and give our people water for butter. If you should give them a tolerance of 2 per cent every day in the year, it is enough to pay 100 per cent dividend a year.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Have there been any hearings upon this bill?

Mr. VOIGT. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that the National Consumers' League is opposed to the bill. Is that true?

Mr. VOIGT. There is some opposition to the bill. I want to say that this amendment can do no harm. Why not put it in and make sure that we shall have butter with at least 80 per cent fat?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE].

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a standard that will give the people the very best butter than can be made. Minnesota has a standard as high on butter as any State in the United States, fully as high as Wisconsin. The cooperative creameries and the dairy food commissioner and the best butter men we have in the State of Minnesota are opposed to this bill in its present form. We believe that if this bill is passed it will be a lowering of the standard of butter. What we want is the double standard, that it shall not provide for less than 80 per cent butter fat and shall not contain more than 16 per cent of water. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] if this bill is going to pass. For years tolerances have been allowed, and if you fix it at 80 per cent they will allow more or less tolerance and make butter with more than 16 per cent water. We want to keep the high standard; we want it fixed in the bill so that there shall not be more than 16 per cent of water.

I think if the bill passes as it comes from the committee, it will result in a lowering of the standard of butter instead of a raising of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the committee amendment striking out the words "and not more than 16 per cent of water" been adopted?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; I understand that has not been adopted. I was of opinion that it had been agreed to, but there is some question about it, and the committee amendment will have to be offered. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I approve of the bill as written, making 80 per cent the minimum, because I believe it can be construed in no other way than that it is a minimum and that all tolerances have been allowed for; but if there is any doubt about it, if any other construction than the one I suggest can be put on these words, then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT] ought to be adopted, because the making of butter with less than 80 per cent fat ought not to be permitted. The scientific men, the chemists, who have had to do with this matter tell us as to the amount of moisture that ought and can properly be in butter; that there really ought not to be more than 12 or 13 or 14 per cent of moisture, and that when it reaches—certainly when it exceeds—16 per cent it is indisputable that moisture has been added or that the presence of excessive moisture is absolutely inexcusable carelessness, so that if we take 80 per cent for the butter fat, 16 per cent as the absolute maximum of moisture, we have 96 per cent, leaving 4 per cent for other ingredients—salt and casein, I believe. If we drop below 80 per cent there is opportunity, even an invitation, for leaving in or putting in too much moisture. I think the bill allowing 80 per cent is proper and safe, because in the States where 82½ per cent is fixed, either by law or regulation, a tolerance of 2½ per cent is allowed, which would bring it down to 80 per cent. I am in favor of the bill as it stands, although personally before the committee I was opposed to striking out the words with regard to the 16 per cent of moisture. I thought they ought to remain in the bill, but I shall not oppose the committee amendment, the committee having as a whole agreed to it, differing from me.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If 4 per cent remains for salt and casein, what would be the situation in case of unsalted butter? There is much of that on the market.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Where does that come in? Without the 4 per cent for salt, you would have more water.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. No; the department by its regulation does not permit more than 16 per cent of moisture under any circumstances. If more than that is found, it is declared adulterated, and a very heavy fine is imposed. I would say also that this bill does not relate in any way to butter made on the farm. This relates to the manufacturers of butter, and the construction of that word does not include farmers or makers of butter in small quantities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, just a word as to the amendment submitted—to the effect that all tolerances have been allowed for. To say the least, it is an unusual thing to do. It would seem that the same phraseology might apply to fixing the standard for butter that is now applied to fixing the standard of the gold dollar or of the silver dollar, or the weight of grains. I have submitted this proposition to several of the best lawyers in the House, and they have all agreed that it is not necessary, that it adds nothing; and I do not know that it detracts anything from the bill.

What have the creamery people to say about it? This matter is something that has been under consideration for the last 30 or 40 years, and practically all of the creamery people are agreed on this bill, although some over in Wisconsin think we ought to add this particular language. As stated, that State has an 82½ per cent standard, but they found it necessary to make it 80 per cent and allow a tolerance of 2½ per cent. The State of Wisconsin has now an 80 per cent standard, as have several other States, and as they have in several other countries. I want to read a few telegrams that I have received. I will select only a few of them. The first telegram is from Omaha, Nebr.:

OMAHA, NEBR., February 9, 1923.

Hon. G. N. HAUGEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The organized dairy industry has given years of study to this question of fat standard, and your bill, as it stands, has the unqualified indorsement of practically all authorities on the subject. We certainly hope that no amendments will be considered that will delay its passage just as the bill came to you from the Senate.

CHAS. HARDING,
President Harding Cream Co.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does that mean that 16 per cent of water is included?

Mr. HAUGEN. We deal with only one at a time. As the gentleman knows, the administration of the food and drug act is under the Department of Agriculture, but adulterated butter requirements are under the Secretary of the Treasury. It was thought best, in view of this, to deal with this one single standard first, and after we have disposed of that then take up the moisture content.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. VOIGT. The gentleman just stated that everybody who was an authority on the question has agreed to this bill. The three leading butter States in the Union are Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The officials of the State of Minnesota and of the State of Wisconsin are in favor of killing this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is mistaken. There are a few of them who have different opinions.

Mr. VOIGT. But I have the telegrams in my possession.

Mr. HAUGEN. Here is a telegram from Michigan:

THE MICHIGAN ASSOCIATION OF CREAMERIES.

Regarding butter standards, we favor the original 80 per cent for shipment, rather than the Voigt amendment.

That telegram is signed by a Mr. Frary, secretary. Here is one from Ohio to the effect that the dairymen in Ohio favor 80 per cent fat standard. That is signed by Mr. Erf, of the Ohio University, and also of the creamery association.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have yielded practically all of my time.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. If these States really mean 80 per cent, why do they object to the Voigt amendment, which means 80 per cent without any interpretation?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman is a lawyer and I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin and every lawyer of this House and ask them the question: Is it necessary, does it add anything to the bill, and can the gentleman point out why it should be injected into this proposition any more than fixing the standard of other things?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Because the Agricultural Department that enforces and is interpreting that law gives 2½ per cent tolerance and in their interpretation they will not permit anything that comes within 2½ per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. Here is another telegram from the Beatrice Creamery, Lincoln, Nebr.:

May I respectfully urge that Mr. VOIGT's amendment regarding tolerances be not adopted?

Here is another telegram from Mr. W. S. Wilcox, of Mason City, Iowa, member of the executive board of American Association of Creamery Butter Manufacturers:

I am opposed to the phrase in the Voigt amendment in your bill, "all tolerances provided for," and suggest instead, 80 per cent flat or more for shipment.

Also one from Dr. G. L. McKay:

Our association is opposed to term, "all tolerances provided for." No one asks for this except some people in Wisconsin. Some years ago Wisconsin passed an 82½ per cent law. It was found impractical to enforce it, and added amendment to same of 2½ per cent tolerance. This is where they get the use of term "all tolerances provided for." Would not object to shipment of butter; must average 80 per cent fat. Fat content of butter hard to control to fraction of per cent.

And one from Judge E. J. Hainer, of Nebraska:

If amendment of your bill is necessary I strongly urge one providing for 80 per cent fat—is more specific, comprehensive, and preferable to that proposed by VOIGT, of Wisconsin. Am writing.

Also one from M. Mortensen, professor of dairying, Iowa State College, and president of National Creamery Butter Makers' Association:

The creamery men of Iowa and members of the National Creamery Butter Makers' Association are in favor of the Haugen bill, recommending 80 per cent butter fat for butter.

If there is any question in the mind of anybody as to the position taken by the producers of butter, I refer him to an article by Professor McKay, secretary of the American Association of Creamery Butter Manufacturers, which appeared in the Chicago Dairy Produce of February 6, 1923.

I would like to have the Clerk read in my time an extract from Professor McKay's article.

The Clerk read as follows:

At all the dairy association meetings, which have been held for a number of years, where the question of standards has come up, resolutions have been passed favoring 80 per cent fat and 16 per cent moisture. Possibly the reason a standard of this kind has been so universally accepted is due to the fact that it is in line with the standards adopted in other countries.

We have a few people who claim they would prefer to work under a ruling. As no one has the right to fix a definite standard, except the Congress of the United States, a ruling would have no standing in court. Therefore, we might infer that those who want to work under a ruling do not desire a butter standard of any kind. I have authentic reports from some of our leading dairy States that butter has been placed in their markets containing as low as 72 per cent fat. The placing of this kind of butter on the market is not only deceiving or cheating the consuming public but it renders unfair competition to other manufacturers who are endeavoring to make honest butter, or butter containing 80 per cent fat or above.

Mr. HAUGEN. Professor McKay is secretary of the American Association of Creamery Butter Manufacturers. As the gentleman knows, in the eighth judicial circuit the court has held it is not enough for the department just to show that butter contains more than 16 per cent of moisture to subject it to the adulterated butter penalties. And under that construction of the law it is, as stated by Professor McKay, possible now to manufacture and sell butter containing 72 per cent. That is in the State of Minnesota, in the eighth circuit. Possibly that may account for the objection to this bill. Now, what we propose to do by this bill is to definitely fix a standard for butter by law; to write into the statute the definition of butter requiring a minimum of 80 per cent butter fat—just what is required now by regulation, nothing more, nothing less; just what has been enforced and which has been the custom for 16 years, not only in this country but in several other countries—a standard that will have the force and effect of law. As is well known, the standards fixed by regulation do not have the force and effect of law but merely serve as a guide. In the enforcement of the pure food and drug act it requires a collection of that proof which is necessary, as, for instance:

Proof to show the custom of the trade.

General practice of the industry and the like.

The Federal standards adopted about 16 years ago by the joint committee required 82½ per cent butter fat. This standard was found to be impracticable, unenforcible, and out of line with the existing customs in the trade, which is almost universal on the basis of 80 per cent. As a result the department announced that it would not attempt to enforce the standard of 82½ per cent, but would require 80 per cent.

A number of States have adopted by statute the impracticable standard of 82½ per cent, but practically none attempt to enforce it.

On December 18, 1922, the 80 per cent milk-fat standard adopted by the joint committee was adopted by the Department of Agriculture as a guide for the officials of the department in enforcing the pure food and drugs act, the standard proposed in this bill.

If the bill is enacted into law it will relieve the department from endless difficulties in enforcing the butter standard.

It protects the honest manufacturer of butter against the manufacturer who takes advantage of the department's difficulty in enforcing its regulations.

It protects the consumer against being imposed upon by manufacturers of butter taking advantage of the department's disadvantages in enforcing its regulations.

The bill was drafted and introduced at the suggestion of representatives of the creamery people. It has the approval of the department and, judging from the numerous letters and telegrams received, it has the indorsement of practically all the creamery and dairy interests.

After the question of butter standards had been generally discussed by the creamery people the question was referred to the American Association's executive committee on the subject of legislation for butter, and after due consideration the committee decided unanimously to ask for the passage of the Haugen bill, now pending before Congress, establishing a minimum fat standard of 80 per cent, which is, as before stated, the standard adopted by the joint committee, the Department of Agriculture, and the standard enforced for the last 16 years, notwithstanding the 82½ per cent standard adopted 16 years ago by the joint committee.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS. Reading over the report, I note that there are 22 States now that require 82½ per cent and only 11 States that require 80 per cent. I was wondering why those States required 82½ per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman will notice that a number of the States have adopted the 82½ per cent standard—some by law, some by regulation. Some States provide that the standards of the United States Department of Agriculture shall automatically become the standards of that State; others provide that the standards of the United States Department of Agriculture may by regulation be used as the standards of that State. Hence this law making 80 per cent butter fat the standard will automatically change the 82½ per cent standard in those States which provide for the adoption of the standards of the United States Department of Agriculture, and many of the 22 States referred to by the gentleman will have their standards changed to 80 per cent automatically by the enactment of this bill. That, the 80 per cent, is the standard that is being enforced.

The department announced that the 82½ per cent standard was impractical, unworkable, and for that reason it was not attempted to enforce it.

Mr. SEARS. In my State they enforce the State law, which is 82½ per cent.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is my understanding that no State enforces the 82½ per cent standard.

Mr. SEARS. If the gentleman will yield for another question, under this bill I see nothing about a person putting 20 per cent of water in the butter.

Mr. HAUGEN. Of course, it is necessary to mix a little salt in the butter; usually from 3 to 3½ per cent of salt is mixed with the butter.

Mr. SEARS. My colleague [Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan] said they should not have more than 16 per cent water.

Mr. HAUGEN. There is a regulation as to that in the Treasury Department, under which the enforcement of adulterated butter laws comes.

Mr. SEARS. Should we not legislate and not permit the department to make regulations? That is, if we know what we want and what should be the law. If this was done then the people would know what was required.

Mr. HAUGEN. I agree with the gentleman that the moisture content should be determined, but let us deal with one thing at a time. Practically all are agreed upon the 80 per cent butter fat, which is the present standard. Then, when the moisture content has been given consideration, and when everybody gets together on the proposition, we can then take up the moisture-content proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is it not true that in this bill, originating in the department, all agreed that the object of the bill was to agree upon a butter-fat content, and that was all in the proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. The question of standard is fixed by the department by regulation, and we want to give it the force and effect of law. It would relieve the department of endless difficulties in enforcing its standard.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. And have the United States uniform in its butter products?

Mr. HAUGEN. Absolutely.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. I notice in the copy of the bill that a portion of it has been stricken out, lines 9 to 10, where it says that not more than 16 per cent of water. What was the object of the committee in removing that restriction?

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, the bill as introduced provided for a double standard of not more than 16 per cent of moisture and required 80 per cent of butter fat. The representatives of the creamery people who appeared before the committee could not get together on the double standard, but were all agreed on the single standard. So the committee decided to take care of the single standard.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think that 16 per cent of moisture in butter is sufficient?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is the regulation now in the Treasury Department.

Mr. ARENTZ. For that reason we ought to take up the bill and make it conform.

Mr. HAUGEN. Your constituents—the consumers—are entitled to that protection. The manufacturer of butter in your district and every other district is entitled to protection against dishonest manufacturers. It is not fair to permit people in one State to manufacture and sell butter containing only 72 per cent of butter fat and compel the people across the line to make butter containing 80 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. How can they do it under the regulation now?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is contended that they have not the power to regulate. We propose to write it in the law, so that the courts may know exactly what the standard is.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is well informed on this subject and I want information. Is it not possible now to prosecute a man who makes butter with only 70 per cent of butter fat?

Mr. HAUGEN. The courts have held that butter containing more than 16 per cent is not under all conditions "adulterated butter." That is the holding in the eighth circuit.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The law of Minnesota provides that butter shall not contain more than 16 per cent of moisture. The gentleman will concede that Minnesota butter is standard the world over.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken. [Laughter.] The gentleman is aware of the fact that in Minnesota and in the eighth circuit it is possible to include more than 16 per cent, and possibly for that reason is the opposition. We object to requiring 80 per cent in one State and allowing another State to manufacture and sell butter containing only 72 per cent.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not know who Mr. McKay is, but I dispute his statement.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understand the gentleman from Iowa takes more time for the purpose of permitting me to answer the question.

Mr. PURNELL. He has only three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, stripped of all this confusion, the purpose of this bill is to define butter and provide a standard therefor. This bill fixes the standard at not less than 80 per cent by weight of milk fat. I agree with these gentlemen, these lawyers in the House who take issue with this amendment for the reason that it is very unusual for us to fix a provision in a bill and by amendment explain what we mean. But there is this justification for it: We have had tolerances recognized by the department and the courts up to 2½ per cent. This practice has become more or less common.

I want to explain to you just how that operates in Indiana. Our State board of health now fixes the butter-fat content at 82½ per cent. If we adopt this standard of 80 per cent and tolerances are then permitted, Indiana 82½ per cent butter would have to compete with 77½ per cent butter under this bill, and for that reason I see no objection to our making it perfectly clear that we want 80 per cent butter fat. I recognize the fact that it is unusual, but the very activity on the part of the people who make butter and who have been accepting these tolerances against this amendment would indicate, to my mind, that they have hope after the adoption of this bill to continue asking for tolerances. That is the very thing we want to prevent. For that reason I am going to support the amendment offered by my colleague on the committee from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT], although it is, as I recognize, very unusual.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I think the time is all up.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. There are committee amendments pending, and also the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT]. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "That," insert the words "for the purposes of the food and drug act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L. p. 768)."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "centum," insert "by weight."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "fat," strike out "and not more than 16 per cent of water."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 29.

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. As many as favor taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Nine gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 2.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, strike out all of section 3.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Voigt amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOIGT: Page 1, line 9, after the word "fat," insert a comma and add "all tolerances having been allowed for."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Agriculture any further business?

WAREHOUSES.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 3220) to amend sections 2, 5, 11, 12, 15, 19, 29, and 30 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to amend the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916.

The amendment to section 2 strikes out the words:

The term "agricultural product" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, and flaxseed, or any of them.

That is to amend the act so as to include all agricultural products suitable for storage.

The amendment to section 5 removes the one-year limitation now placed upon licenses, so as not to require the warehouseman to take out a new license every year. The license may be terminated by the Secretary at any time whenever the warehouseman fails to comply.

The amendment to section 11 of the act provides for licensing persons to inspect and sample products.

The amendment to section 12 adds in two places the words "inspect, sample, or," so as to make the section conform with the proposed amendment to section 11.

The amendment to section 15 strikes out the words "grain, flaxseed, or," and the word "other." As the section now reads there has been doubt as to whether grain or flaxseed, regardless of the manner in which they may be stored, are under all conditions fungible agricultural products. This makes the definition clear.

The amendment to section 19 strikes out the words "in this act defined." That is because the amendment to section 2 eliminates the definition of agricultural products, therefore the words "in this act defined" are useless.

The amendment to section 29 inserts the words "inspectors and samplers" in two places to harmonize with amendments 11 and 12, and increases the severity of the penalty which may be imposed, and imposes penalties on persons who draw, with intent to deceive, a false sample of a product or who willfully mutilate or falsely represent samples drawn under the act or who fraudulently grade or weigh agricultural products stored. It is not believed that the offense is now punishable or sufficiently broad in scope.

The bill is recommended by the Department of Agriculture, and in the enforcement of the act it seems necessary that these amendments be made.

Mr. HUDSPETH. What change does the bill make with reference to wool warehouses and the storage of wool?

Mr. HAUGEN. They are being licensed now.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does it make any change in the present law?

Mr. HAUGEN. It makes the same change as to warehouses storing wool as it does to warehouse storing other products. I have here a statement of the number of warehouses that are licensed. On December 21, 1922, there were 368 cotton warehouses, 17 wool warehouses, 217 grain warehouses, and 60 tobacco warehouses. On February 1 the total number was 360 cotton, 20 wool, 227 grain, and 62 tobacco warehouses.

Mr. ELLIS. How many new inspectors are provided for?

Mr. HAUGEN. As many as the department may provide. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to time in his own right in opposition to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not opposing the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman. How much time does he desire?

Mr. SWANK. Five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK] five minutes.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 2343, a warehouse bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on different occasions before this I have argued for agricultural legislation and have spoken in support of my farmers' warehouse bill, H. R. 2343. I have spoken in behalf of this bill on the floor and before the Committee on Agriculture. I have been anxious at all times to call the attention of Congress to the necessity of this legislation. Agriculture is the key to our national prosperity. It makes no difference where a person lives or in what business he may be engaged, he can enjoy no permanent prosperity without it first reaches the farmer.

When there is a wave of prosperity among the farmers everybody enjoys good times, and without their being reasonably prosperous it is useless to talk about other legislation intended to correct the economic ills of the country. You must begin at the source. If the physician wishes to cure a certain disease he must first find the seat of the trouble and begin there. Too much legislation begins at the greatest distance from the farmer. Increased tariff rates causing him to pay more for the necessities of life can not help but only retards his economic recovery. The millions proposed in the ship subsidy bill will only add to his troubles in the way of a bonus to special privilege and increased taxation. Increased activities of the Government asking for increased appropriations where not needed do not remedy this situation. There remains something else to be done. A high tariff only lessens his export trade and foreign shipments and thereby decreases the price of his products. Instead of a situation like that, he must be furnished a fair and easily accessible market for the products of his toil. He always has produced the goods and will so continue if given a chance and an "even break" with other lines of business.

It is too often assumed that if certain lines of business for a time make a large profit that this will afford relief to the farmer. It is the farmer who feeds the world, and he should be given a fair chance with our other citizens. Let the farmer fail to plant a crop for one season and there will not be a bank with its doors open, not a store doing business, and no trains running on the many railroads. Agriculture is our basic industry, and the one upon which all others depend. When we do something for this great industry we are assisting all other lines of business. In order to find a cure for the farmers' troubles we must first study his problems.

Like some other Members of Congress, I was reared on the farm and lived there until manhood and have always studied the problems of the farmer, trying to find some method of meeting a solution of his difficulties. In order to legislate effectively for agriculture we must understand the business just as the banker must know the banking business in order to make a success in that line of endeavor. Mr. Chairman, there is something wrong with conditions when a hard-working, law-abiding man, and his good wife with their children, work and drudge from morning to night trying to make something from their toil to clothe and feed the family, and in the evening of life find themselves with no property, little clothing, coarse and insufficient food. The wealth of the country has been too unfairly distributed and the situation can never be remedied until something can be done to relieve these conditions. Of all business men in this country, the farmers have always received the "little end" of the bargain. It is within the power of Congress to do something for him, and it should be done now. It should have been done long ago, and especially in 1919, and no excuse can be given for not doing something the past three years. Much has been done for the big business interests of the country, even this session, but what has been done for the farmer? Surtaxes were reduced and excess-profits taxes repealed. A man who did not make the profit did not have the high rate of taxes to pay, and if he made the profit he could afford to pay the taxes. The most prohibitive tariff bill ever drawn was written into law for the benefit of those who need no special legislation, and I am glad that I voted against that bill. All that was class legislation pure and simple, but when you propose something for the farmer some will refer to it as class legislation, and some who supported the tariff bill might indulge in that pastime. Of course, everything can not be done by Congress, and indolence can not be transformed into industry by legislation, but the farmer is not asking for that to be done, as he is in the class of the industrious and law-abiding. The reason I speak for the farmer is that he has not had a fair opportunity and the whole business of the Nation depends upon that of the farmer. All that he asks is to be given a fair chance with the rest of the people and especially with those favored industries heretofore cared for. If the necessities of life are to be continued to be produced something must be done. A merchant or other business man can not continue in business when his expenses are greater than his income.

When confronted by that situation he must close out. Yet that is just what has happened to the farmer and that is the situation with which he is grappling to-day. Since 1919 he has been producing his crops and live stock at a great loss, and yet has done less grumbling than any other class. He is the center of the whole system of trade and industry.

I have been asked what remedy I propose and will gladly tell you. Many bills for his relief have been proposed and introduced in Congress, and I believe with a desire to help the producers of the necessities of life. The farmer furnishes the world something to eat and wear. He has worked just as hard as heretofore, and when the war profiteers were getting theirs at his expense he never grumbled, for he was receiving a better price than usual, and even in the time of high prices he was producing at a loss. When the farmer was getting 40 cents per pound for cotton, $2 per bushel for wheat, and $1 per bushel for corn, you could hear it said that he was getting rich. That talk was indulged in by people who did not know him nor anything about his business and the conditions under which he worked.

Suppose an average farmer produced 10 bales of cotton, which is an extraordinary production, at 40 cents per pound. That would bring him $2,000. If he is a renter, and most farmers are, he must pay the landlord one-fourth, or $500, which leaves $1,500 for himself and family. Counting the work of himself and one team at $75 per month, and this was a low figure for 1919 and 1920, would add another cost of $900. Then figure his wife the same salary that it would cost to hire some other woman to do the housework, and this would amount to at least $50 per month, or $600 per year, which added to the $900 would make $1,500. This would leave the children nothing for their work, allow nothing for food and clothing for the family, upkeep of his farming implements, interest, taxes, and the depreciation of his working capital. He is entitled to a fair margin of profit on his labor and capital as other lines of business, and his faithful wife should be considered, for she works just as hard as her husband. It matters not in what work people are engaged, just so long as it is honest they are entitled to a comfortable living, and a great deal more so than those whose hands have never been stained with honest toil and who live in their grandeur and splendor.

The farmer does not have servants to answer his every nod and beck, he does not have expensive automobiles and liveried chauffeurs at his command, but is a far better man than he who sits in the seat of the mighty and seeks to keep him muffled still.

The farmers will not submit much longer, for they know the use and the power of the ballot. They will go about any change in a peaceful and law-abiding manner and never resort to the cruel methods of the outlaw and the extortionist and those who have always enjoyed special privilege. All the power that is at the command of the farmers of the country is the power of the ballot, and they realize who are their friends. What they want is action and less talk. Many remedies have been offered. Bills to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase wheat and bills to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States have been offered and many other bills along similar lines. What is the import of all these bills? Their object is to help the farmer, but there can be no effective rural-credit legislation without adequate storage facilities. If the products of the farm can be properly stored in sufficient quantities, then relief can be afforded by loans on warehouse receipts. Remember that storage facilities must first be provided.

On the 11th day of April, 1921, the first day of the special session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, I introduced this farmers' warehouse bill, H. R. 2343. The bill is written in plain language, unambiguous, and easily understood. It is short and can be administered easily. The bill provides that stored products shall be insured at actual cost. Of course, some of the old-line insurance companies may not like that provision of the bill, but, Mr. Chairman, I am trying to do something for the present economic distress of the country by beginning at the source of all business. Some may cry "socialism," but that is often the cry of a person when he knows no other argument and wants a certain measure defeated. The bill under consideration provides that when any State makes an appropriation to build warehouses, or when any farmers' cooperative association having a selling agent makes an appropriation for such purpose, the Federal Government shall duplicate such appropriation. It is similar legislation to our present good-roads law, but more important. We can live, prosper, and enjoy life without hard-surfaced roads and even without railroads, though it would inconvenience us to some extent, but we can not live without something to eat and wear, and that is produced on the farm. These products are furnished by the farmer, and he should enjoy the fruits of his labor as he adds to the enjoyment of others.

We need better roads and better railroad facilities, but the question now before us is, What will be done for America's greatest industry? There is a precedent for Government owned and operated warehouses in the ownership at this time of 348 warehouses for the storage of liquor. It seems to me that it is more important to have places for the storage of wheat, corn, cotton, and other farm products than to have warehouses for the storage of liquor. I believe that Congress wants to do something for agriculture, but the question in the minds of the Members is what is best to do at this time. I will try to show you what I think is the best to do for the agricultural industries of the country.

The Secretary of Agriculture, the head of the farming activities of the United States, is interested in the promotion of agriculture. The bill under consideration provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, the president of the board of agriculture in a State where such warehouse is located, and a representative chosen by the farmers' cooperative associations in any such State shall constitute the board of control. This provision of the bill will encourage the organization of farmers' associations, and this is necessary to the farmers' interests. They must organize like other lines of business organize. This is one of the objects of the bill. The warehouses will be under the management of the board of control, which is authorized to acquire property and property rights for the erection of the warehouses. Provision is made for the employment of a superintendent for the warehouses, the salaries to be paid by the States where the warehouses are located. Several States have a warehouse law, and we also have a Federal warehouse law, but they are all permissive laws—that is, individuals and organizations are given permission to build warehouses and charge a certain fee for the storage of products. I think that the Government should build the warehouses outright, without any other aid, but I have drawn this bill cooperatively between the States and with farmers' cooperative associations. It is provided in this bill that the official standards of the United States for farm products shall be the official standards of the warehouses created by this bill. It is, of course, necessary that uniform grades be established and not have thousands of unofficial graders, each of whom can set his own standards.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it the gentleman's idea that these warehouse receipts shall be negotiable?

Mr. SWANK. Yes.

It is to the best interests of the farmers and the country that the Government supervise the grading. The issuance of warehouse receipts is provided for in the bill, and they shall be negotiable and in the form prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Adequate punishment is provided for the violation of the provisions of the act. The location of the warehouses is subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States. The warehouse receipts would be convenient, little expense attached in recording them, and no doubt the local banks would be glad to loan on them as security. In order to prevent any organization from opposing the system by refusing to loan money on the warehouse receipts, the bill provides that the Federal reserve banks shall loan money on the warehouse receipts.

The bill provides that the board of control shall prescribe the fees to be charged for the storage of farm products, and said fees shall not be in excess of the actual cost of maintaining the warehouses. I have been told that if the farmers want warehouses they should build them at their own expense. I answer that the perpetuity of the Government is so closely linked with agriculture that it is a Government problem. Farming is organized and operated on an entirely different basis to other lines of business. One of the greatest fights the farmers have to make is to get money with which to finance their business. They are beginning to organize effectively, as some candidates for office have found out, and more will feel the effect of this organization later unless something is done to promote this the greatest of all industries. The enactment of this bill into law will encourage the farmers of the country to greater effort and the entire Government will prosper thereby.

Congress has appropriated, and not so long ago at that, many millions of dollars for the assistance of the railroads of the country and guaranteed them a certain per cent of profit. If it is said that the railroads were taken over by the Government during the war, to be turned back to the owners in as good condition as when taken, then, Mr. Chairman, I answer that the farmer's business was also taken over and he was called upon to plant certain crops and on some of these crops the price was fixed by act of Congress. If that was necessary then, it is necessary now that something be done for him in order that he may continue to feed and clothe the world.

In the readjustment after the war the farmers lost millions, and it will be many years before they recover. Why should not Congress do as much for him as for the railroads? I am asking for only $100,000,000 in this bill. Were it not for the farmers there would be but little for the railroads to transport. The Secretary of Agriculture, before the Traffic Club of Philadelphia, January 9, 1922, said:

> Agriculture provides the railroads with more than 20 per cent of their total tonnage, and indirectly with as much more. But for the agricultural tonnage many of our great transportation systems would fail.

But the relief given the railroads by Congress was not all that was done for them. They were given permission to increase their freight rates, and now, more than four years after the war, the rates are almost as high as ever. A few small decreases have been made, but no material change. It costs more now to haul freight than the producer can get in many instances for his articles when landed at their destination. If the Interstate Commerce Commission does not act and cause a material reduction in freight rates, then I insist that Congress should act. Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission and can also set the act aside. Congress can make the rates the same as it can delegate the authority to some other body. The time has come for action. Some say that the railroads can not make a profit, but they have made a profit and will continue to do so, and they are no more entitled to a profit than the farmer. During the past few years the farmer planted his crops when the cost of production was high—the highest in the history of the country. He paid more for his farming implements, feed, and maintenance. The necessaries of life cost him more than in any other period of time. Many of our best farmers were driven into bankruptcy and can not even pay their taxes. The farmer is certainly entitled to as much consideration as any business man. Millions have been appropriated to pay contractors who lost money on certain contracts during the war, but nothing appropriated for the farmer. He was patriotic during the war, as at all other times, and it was his occupation more than any other that caused the quick termination of the war, for he fed and clothed the allied armies. He planted what the Government asked and never complained. He has always done his part by the Government, which he respects and loves, and in this bill is only asking for a small appropriation, compared to the industry. It will assist him to recover from the disaster of the past few years.

To refute the claim that the railroads are making no profit, I wish to insert a statement from the Interstate Commerce Commission:

Mr. LOWREY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWANK. I yield.

Mr. LOWREY. Does the gentleman know what per cent that is on the investment in the railroads?

Mr. SWANK. More than 5 per cent on a valuation of $18,000,000,000, and the farmer can not make any profit on his labor and investment.

This statement shows that these roads, for the year 1921, had a net revenue from railroad operations of $965,752,974. Now, this looks like some profit to me. But the farmer could not borrow money on his crops and could not sell them for enough to pay the harvesting in many instances. His good wife and children who assisted him in raising his crops were often without sufficient clothes and his children in many cases were compelled to remain away from school. They are not asking any special favors. Some say these warehouses should be erected by the States, but I hear no one advocating that method for hard-surfaced roads. The reason for Government assistance for hard-surfaced roads is on account of their importance to the Government. In measures like the good roads law and this warehouse bill there should be cooperation between the Government and the States.

I have been asked if the bill would be constitutional and I answer that it would. I investigated its constitutionality thoroughly before introducing the bill. The Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure, commonly called "Cyc," which is a recognized authority among all lawyers and in all courts on the general law, in volume 2, page 73, lays down the following:

> Agricultural societies are agencies of the State, created for the purpose of assisting in promoting a most important industry, and acts authorizing appropriations of public money in their behalf are not unconstitutional, although such appropriations to private corporations are forbidden.

From this legal statement it is seen that on account of the importance of the farming industry our courts have held that appropriations for farming associations are not unconstitutional.

The Republican platform of 1920 says:

The farmer is the backbone of the Nation. The crux of the present agricultural condition lies in prices, labor, and credit. The Republican Party believes that this condition can be improved by * * * the right to form cooperative associations for marketing their products and protection against discrimination.

The Democratic platform of 1920 says:

We favor such legislation as will confirm to the primary producers of the Nation the right to collective bargaining and the right of cooperative handling and marketing of the products of the workshop and the farm and such legislation as will facilitate the exportation of our farm products.

This shows the importance which the two great political parties attach to agriculture. The farmers are the only class, business, or profession who produce more of the necessities of life than they consume. There are 6,500,000 farms in the United States and some 13,000,000 men engaged upon these farms, but unless something is done for agriculture the farms of the country will be depopulated. In many cases farmers have been compelled to forfeit large sums of money as part payment on farms and finally have the mortgage take it all. Many of our best farmers have been obliged to leave the farm and go to the city. Men can not be expected to work hard all their lives on the farm and not even make the necessaries of life for their families. According to statistics, business failures increase in a surprising ratio to poor prices and reduced revenue on the farm, and there is a great reduction in business failures when the farmer obtains a reasonable price for the products of his toil. When agriculture is depressed the number of business failures are more than doubled in comparison to the number of failures when the farmer is in reasonably good circumstances. When the farmer receives poor prices for his goods business is bad, failures many, and the laboring people suffer thereby in unemployment and low wages. Therefore, everyone enjoys the prosperity of the farmer and suffers when poor prices are prevalent.

The Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for 1921 says:

The experiences of recent years have shown more clearly than ever before that an efficient agriculture is of vital importance to all the people. During the darkest days of the war success or failure turned on an adequate food supply. The promotion of agriculture is therefore in the interest of all the people. Conditions which are harmful to the producers and which tend to jeopardize future production must be noted with concern to all of our people, and the national energy should be turned toward improving such conditions. The farmer, therefore, must produce on faith. He must himself carry all the risks of weather, of heat and cold, of flood and drought, of destructive storms, of insect pests, and plant and animal diseases. If the farmers of America should cease work for a single crop season, millions upon millions of people would suffer for food. They have never ceased to work, no matter what the trials and hardships.

The Department of Agriculture published this book as head of the farming industry, and it contains the research and opinions of men who have studied carefully these subjects and realize that something must be done.

Everyone knows that the farmer is not receiving a fair price for his products and his work. We all know that farm prices are unreasonably depressed, and we should exert our best efforts to find a remedy for present conditions. I think the bill under consideration will bring relief and is worthy the most careful consideration of Congress. If something is not done to stop the drift from the country to the city, disaster will surely follow. What we need now is legislation that will assist in rehabilitating our greatest industry—agriculture. Of course, we can not legislate good crops, rain, sunshine, and industry, but we can enact laws that will stop price fixing on farm products by those whose only interest is to get those products as cheaply as possible and further depress prices. We can pass laws that will be a great benefit to the marketing system of the farmers by providing a method for the storage of his products and the issuance of warehouse receipts against these products. The Secretary of Agriculture says that we must see to it that the road between the farmer and the consumer is open and direct and that the farmer have a free and competitive market in which to dispose of his products. These recommendations of the Secretary will follow the enactment of this bill into law.

The report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress says:

In the last 10 years the total number of mortgages on farm lands and buildings owned by their operators has more than doubled and has increased proportionately more than the value of the lands and buildings. Railroad service, like any other service or commodity, must be sold at a price within the reach of the people who pay for it. Freight rates, therefore, must bear some relation to the prices which it is possible to obtain from the commodities transported. Numerous instances were brought to the attention of the commission in which it was shown that the total receipts from shipments, especially of fruits and vegetables, were absorbed by railroad charges in transporting them to market, leaving to the producer nothing for his time, labor, and investment in producing them. No industry can survive or prosper under such conditions.

The commission further says:

The warehouse system of the United States is a decentralized and disintegrated system, subject to the widest variations of regulation of the warehouseman's liability in the different States. This situation does not lend itself to systematic marketing or orderly financing of farmers' crops. The farmer can not hope to adequately control the marketing of his products or to have influence in proportion to his number and importance in the absence of a warehouse system which will enable him to hold or sell his crops as his own judgment, or the judgment of the cooperative association of which he may be a member, dictates.

The bill which I have proposed will enable him to hold and to sell his crops as his own judgment dictates by furnishing him a place for storage of his products and loans on his warehouse receipts. Under the present system when the farmer gathers his crops he must either be permitted to borrow money on his receipts if he so desires, or sell at once to pay his taxes, interest, and buy something to eat and wear. This bill will enable him to hold his products until he can sell on a fair market. Under this system he can not be compelled to sell when the market is low and below the cost of production.

The report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1921 says:

Marketing is as truly a part of production as is the growing of the crops, for the crops have no value unless they can be put into the hands of those who need them. The assembling, storing, and distributing of farm products are productive enterprises, and those engaged in this work require much the same economic and technical information as that required by farmers.

In the Agricultural Yearbook for 1921 we find the following:

When we remember that approximately 40 per cent of all our people live in the open country and are dependent upon what grows out of the soil, the baneful effect upon the Nation of reducing the purchasing power of that 40 per cent so far below normal is obvious. The farmer is compelled to practice the most rigid economy, to wear his old clothes, to repair his old machinery, to refrain from purchasing everything he can possibly do without, and to deny himself and his family not alone luxuries but many of the ordinary comforts of life.

Every person who is at all familiar with farm conditions today knows the facts above stated, but what is Congress going to do for the producer? What has Congress done to remedy the situation, and what does it propose?

The same volume continues:

The cost of getting farm products from the farm to the consumer's table has increased tremendously during the past three years. The freight charge has very nearly doubled, and in some cases more than doubled. When wheat was selling at $2.50 per bushel, corn at $1.75, cattle and hogs at $16 to $22 per hundred, cotton at 30 cents per pound, the increased freight rate was not a serious matter. But with wheat at $1, corn at 48 cents, cattle and hogs at $7 to $10 per hundred, cotton at 17 to 20 cents—all these being primary market prices, not farm prices—the addition of even 10 cents per bushel or per hundred pounds imposes a burden grievious to be borne. The transportation matter is one of vital importance to agriculture.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, railroad rates are of vital importance to the farmers, but what are we going to do to relieve the situation? On the question of freight rates I say that if the Interstate Commerce Commission permits such exorbitant charges when the roads are making such enormous profits, then Congress should take the matter in hand and reduce the rates in fairness and justice to these producers about whom we hear so much. I am proposing a remedy both to reduce the railroad rates and to provide a place for the storage of farm products at Government and State expense.

I here insert a statement from the Department of Agriculture on the farm mortgage debt of the United States:

Farm mortgage debt.

	1920	1910
Number of farms reporting amount of debt	1,193,047	1,006,511
Value of lands and buildings on farms reporting	$13,775,500,013	$6,330,236,951
Amount of mortgage debt on farms reporting	$4,003,767,192	$1,726,172,851
Ratio of debt to value (per cent)	29.1	27.3

	1920 (Jan. 1).	1910 (Apr. 15).
Value of lands in farms	$54,829,563,059	$28,475,674,169
Buildings	11,486,439,543	6,325,451,528
Implements and machinery	3,594,772,928	1,265,149,783
Live stock	8,013,324,808	4,925,173,610
Total value of all farm property	77,924,100,338	40,991,449,090

The Yearbook for 1921 further says:

The warehousing of cotton after ginning is very important economically. Leaving the baled cotton exposed to the weather results in large losses annually from the rotting of the fiber. The cotton warehouse is a place of shelter and protection from fire and theft, a place for classing and assorting to meet mill requirements, and, finally, it is a place where cotton may be deposited under conditions which enable the owner to obtain money advance upon it until such time as he may desire to sell. Receipts of responsible warehouses are considered among the best kind of security.

What is here said about warehousing cotton may be said about most all farm products; and my bill provides these warehouses for the storage of grain, cotton, broom corn, wool, and other nonperishable farm products suitable for storage and shipment.

The 1921 Yearbook says that the realization of the enormous benefits to be derived from cooperative warehousing of cotton has led to the rapid organization in all of the principal cotton-growing States of farmers' associations to finance the building of centralized fireproof warehouses for the proper storage and handling of their crop. The farmer should not be compelled to build these warehouses, and no great number are built, and, therefore, his cotton and other crops are often left out in the weather, unless sold when harvested. This bill enacted into law would increase the farmers' associations, protect his crops from damage by the weather, and insure crop marketing in an orderly manner, and would cause him to receive a fair price.

The Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1922 says:

During 1921 we exported large quantities of agricultural products, especially those products which were selling at ruinously low prices. This export movement has been decreasing.

Mr. Chairman, statistics show that we can not have exports without imports, and the law that places prohibitive tariff rates on imports will be reflected in decreased exports, to the injury of the farmer. It will thus be seen that the tariff law recently enacted instead of assisting agriculture has done it a great injustice. But who was this tariff law supposed to benefit? It certainly has injured the farmer by decreasing his exports.

From a statement of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture under date of December 31, 1921, and December 23, 1922, the estimate and value based upon prices December 1 are as follows:

	Production.	Value.
Cotton:	Bales.
1919	11,420,763	$2,034,658,000
1920	13,440,000	933,658,000
1921	7,954,000	643,933,000
1922	9,964,000	1,192,461,000
Wheat:	Bushels.
1919	968,279,000	2,080,686,000
1920	833,027,000	1,197,263,000
1921	814,905,000	754,834,000
1922	856,211,000	864,139,000
Corn:
1919	2,816,318,000	3,786,516,000
1920	3,208,584,000	2,150,332,000
1921	3,068,569,000	1,297,213,000
1922	2,890,712,000	1,900,287,000

According to Crops and Markets, published by the United States Department of Agriculture December 23, 1922, the total value of all crops in the United States is as follows: The 1916–1920 average, $12,522,239,000; 1921 the value is $6,410,229,000, and 1922 it is $9,114,347,000.

These great crops have been produced by the farmer not only without any profit but at a great loss. There is something wrong when conditions are such that the farmers must produce at a loss and can not make any profit and not even current wages for himself and family.

The Department of Agriculture estimates that the cost of producing cotton in 1920 in some of the States was 33 cents per pound. In some sections the cost is much more. About the same ratio of loss in production will be true with other crops. A statement from the Department of Agriculture for 1920 shows that from 167 farms in three counties in the State of Iowa the average yield of wheat per acre is 18.5 bushels, at a cost of $1.88 per bushel; 40 acres at that price and yield would cost $1,391.20 to produce, and even at $2 per bushel the farmer would have $88.80 left, not estimating anything for his wife's labor, depreciation of his capital, interest, and taxes. A summary of 481 records prepared by the Department of Agriculture for 1919 from the States of Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, Minnesota, and North and South Dakota shows that the net cost of producing wheat for that year was $2.15 per bushel. The department also says that of 451 records in 1920 in Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma the net cost per bushel of producing wheat is: In Missouri, $2.21; Nebraska, $1.91; Kansas, $1.77; Oklahoma, $1.98. Men can not continue to raise wheat that costs $2 per bushel and sell the same for $1 per bushel. Investigations by the Agricultural College of North Dakota show that the average cost of raising a bushel of wheat in that State was $1.43 in 1922.

The following statement from the Department of Agriculture shows the cost of producing cotton, corn, and wheat in 1921 and 1922:

Cost of producing farm crops.
(Preliminary estimates for 1922.)

Crops.	States.	1921		1922
		Yield per acre.	Cost per unit.	Yield per acre.	Cost per unit.
Wheat (winter)	Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri	13 bushels	$2.01	14 bushels	$1.25
Wheat (spring)	North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota	9 bushels	2.20	14 bushels	1.00
Corn	Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana	34 bushels	.64	34 bushels	.61
Cotton	Georgia, S. Carolina, Alabama, Texas	110 pounds	.32	125 pounds	.25

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not speaking for the great State of Oklahoma alone, for this bill will benefit the producers of all sections of this great Republic. Oklahoma has a great diversity of products. Her production for each of the past three years of cotton, wheat, and corn is as follows:

Cotton:	Bales.
1920	1,336,000
1921	481,000
1922	635,000
Wheat:	Bushels.
1920	54,080,000
1921	47,325,000
1922	31,350,000
Corn:
1920	78,960,000
1921	76,925,000
1922	57,600,000

Oklahoma ranks first among the several States in the production of oil and in 1920 she produced about 106,000,000 barrels, valued at $371,000,000. She raises more broom corn than all the other States combined, and Lindsay, Garvin County, Okla., is the largest broom corn wagon market in the world. Oklahoma has more than 170 separate and distinct oil and gas pools and more than 30,000 producing oil and gas wells in 38 counties. She produces millions of dollars of lead and zinc, and the United States Geological Survey has estimated the total coal supply of Oklahoma at 79,000,000,000 tons, The Oklahoma geological survey estimates the present available supply under present mining conditions at 8,000,000,000 tons. She also has millions of tons of asphalt, salt, limestone, and granite. In addition to all this she produces each year millions of dollars' worth of milk and cream, poultry and eggs, and other farm products. The people in the district which I have the honor to represent in the American Congress are not all engaged in agriculture, but they know that their success depends largely on the success of the farmer. In this district is the great city of Oklahoma City, which is the capital of the State and her largest city, the State university, the agricultural and mechanical college, the Central State Teachers' College, and the great oil fields.

This bill is not directed to one class of products nor to any one section, but will benefit the wheat and corn grower of the North as well as the cotton farmer of the South.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that in normal times there is a loss of over $70,000,000 to baled cotton as a result of permitting it to remain exposed to weather for months at a time without attention or covering of any kind. I am asking for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to begin with in constructing these warehouses, and it would result in a saving to the country in one year to cotton alone of more than $70,000,000. Other farm crops suffer great loss by a lack of proper warehousing, and in addition to this care of the crops the bill will stimulate the producers to greater activity in their cooperative associations and the establishment of selling agencies, and they will be enabled thereby to more directly market their products to the manufacturer and the consumer.

Gentlemen of the committee, if this bill were enacted into law and properly administered the marketing of farm products would be settled. This bill provides the storage, and the selling would be done as the demand required. All businesses and professions organize for mutual protection and the promotion of their interests, and such encouragement should be given the farmers. The watchword of the farmers should be organization and cooperation. This bill would benefit not only the farmers but all business. It would be an easy matter to reduce other appropriations to the extent of $100,000,000, the amount asked in this bill. The farmers are the backbone of the Government. Fostering our agricultural interests and the payment of good living wages that workers may enjoy some of the comforts of life as well as the necessities is the best bulwark against Bolshevism which thrives on unrest and low prices. [Applause.]

INDORSEMENTS OF THE BILL.

FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF PRESIDENT, UNION CITY, GA.,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1922.

Hon. F. B. SWANK,
House of Representatives, City.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with interest H. R. 2343, a bill to provide that the United States of America shall build warehouses in conjunction with the several States and in cooperation with duly and legally organized farmers' cooperative associations in said States for the storage of farm products not perishable, for the insurance of said products while in storage, for Government loans on warehouse receipts, providing penalties for the violation of this act, making an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes.

This bill meets my hearty approval and, in my judgment, is a most constructive measure. The farmers of this country need not only a comprehensive and far-reaching system of marketing, but they are also sorely in need of sufficient money for long periods of time and at a low rate of interest. In my judgment, your bill will assist most materially in bringing about the consummation of the end sought to be reached by the farmers, who are the producing class of all countries.

I have also read with pleasure the argument made by you in defense of your bill before the Committee on Agriculture of the House on February 8, 1922. The observations in which you indulged on that occasion and the data presented strike me as unanswerable.

At your convenience I would like to have a conference with you in regard to your bill, and if you find where I can be of assistance in promoting your bill please let me know.

With assurances of high regard, I am,

Very truly yours,
C. S. BARRETT,
President Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America.

AMERICAN COTTON ASSOCIATION,
Montgomery, Ala., May 25, 1921.

Hon. F. B. SWANK, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We thank you for copies of your warehouse bill and the remarks you made on the measure. We have read them with a great deal of interest and will be glad to further the movement if in our power.

Yours very truly,
AMERICAN COTTON ASSOCIATION,
W. R. GREENE, Secretary.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., August 13, 1921.

Hon. F. B. SWANK, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have examined with considerable interest your warehouse bill. I heartily indorse it and would be glad to see it become a law. I don't see any reason why the Government should not make appropriations to help agriculture as much so as the railroads. If they will appropriate an equal amount for the agriculture of the country, I am sure there will be less complaint among the farmers. I see no reason why the Government should not guarantee a profit to the farmers as well as to the railroads. Push your bill, and I am sure all farm organizations in the cotton-producing States will support your measure.

Very truly,
GEO. L. SANDS,
President State Farmers' Union.

ENID, OKLA., January 16, 1922.

Hon. F. B. SWANK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Have carefully studied your bill, H. R. 2343, and also your speech, and I will say that it is absolutely fine and the very thing we want. If you are successful in getting this through, am sure that the farmers of Oklahoma will reward you for your services.

Yours very truly,
OKLAHOMA WHEAT GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
By JOHN MANLEY, Secretary-Treasurer.

The annual meeting of the Farmers' Union of Oklahoma, August 16, 17, 18, 1921, in Oklahoma City, where there were 313 delegates present from 40 counties in resolutions addressed to the Oklahoma delegation, among other recommendations, stated that "they vote for the Swank warehouse bill or any similar bills."

The bill under consideration also has the following indorsements: Cotton Growers' Association of Wayne, Okla.; Cotton Growers' Association of Civit, Okla.; farmers' meeting at Foster, Okla.; general meeting at Drake, Okla.; cotton growers' meeting at Washington, Okla.; Farmers Union, local resolution from Noble, Okla.

The Muskogee County Farmers' Union in convention May 19, 1921, petitioned the Oklahoma delegation in Congress, among other recommendations, as follows: "That they give their solid support to the Swank warehouse bill." Like resolutions were adopted by the following Farmers' Union locals in Oklahoma:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SANDERS of Indiana having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 253. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment numbered 127 to the bill (H. R. 13660) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

That the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 33, 56, 76, 83, 105, 112, 116, 118, 126, and 129 of said bill.

That the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124 to said bill, had further insisted upon its said amendment, had requested a further conference with the House of Representatives upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. GLASS, and Mr. SHEPPARD as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAREHOUSES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the bill apply to warehouses in cities where they apply for a license?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; they have warehouses licensed by the department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You are attempting to change the law materially, and you are offering amendments from the floor in lieu of committee amendments, and for that reason I think we ought to have a thorough explanation of the changes in existing law.

Mr. HAUGEN. The changes are set out in the report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But we do not know what you propose to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the term 'warehouse' as used in this act shall be deemed to mean every building, structure, or other protected inclosure in which any agricultural product is or may be stored for interstate or foreign commerce, or, if located within any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, in which any agricultural product is or may be stored. As used in this act, 'person' includes a corporation or partnership or two or more persons having a joint or common interest; 'warehouseman' means a person lawfully engaged in the business of storing agricultural products; and 'receipt' means a warehouse receipt."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Iowa whether, as stated in the report, the first committee amendment proposes to amend the United States warehouse act only by adding at the end of the second sentence of section 6 the words "including the requirements of fire insurance."

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendment offered by the committee will leave it discretionary whether the fire insurance shall be required.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We have read the bill to the end of line 4, page 2, and it amends section 2 of the warehouse act. Now, what change is there in that section from existing law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the Clerk read the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached the amendments in the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What changes are there in section 2 of the United States warehouse act?

Mr. HAUGEN. It strikes out the following sentence: "The term 'agricultural product' wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, and flaxseed, or any of them." It strikes out those words, which has the effect of including agricultural products. Under the present law only cotton, wool, grain, and tobacco, and flaxseed may be stored in licensed warehouses. With this amendment there will be no limit as to the number of agricultural products that may be stored in a licensed warehouse.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the report which reads as follows:

> The first committee amendment proposes to amend the said United States warehouse act by adding at the end of the second sentence of section 6 the words "including the requirements of fire insurance."

There is nothing in the report which tells us what changes there are in the Senate bill from existing law. Does not the gentleman from Iowa think we should have that explanation?

Mr. HAUGEN. If the gentleman will read the report he will find the explanation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not the report of the House committee.

Mr. HAUGEN. Absolutely.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Where?

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, at the bottom of page 2 and top of page 3.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The report of the House committee reads:

> The first committee amendment proposes to amend the said United States warehouse act by adding at the end of the second sentence of section 6 the words "including the requirements of fire insurance."

That relates to the amendment proposed by the House committee. Nowhere is there a statement in the report of what the effect of the Senate bill is as to existing law.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is on page 3. I will read it:

> The first amendment suggested amends section 2 by striking out the following sentence: "The term 'agricultural product' wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, and flaxseed, or any of them."
> In explanation of that amendment it should be said that the department has had a number of requests in the past several years to license warehouses which are used for the storage of agricultural products other than those now enumerated in the act—

And so forth. The report goes on in detail as to all the changes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; but we have not reached section 6. We are on section 2, and section 2 is recommended by the House Committee on Agriculture in exactly the same form in which it passed the Senate. Now, in what respect did the Senate bill amend existing law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Just as stated in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me read it to the gentleman. You will find it on top of page 3 of the report:

> The first amendment proposes to amend section 2 by striking out the following sentence: "The term 'agricultural product' wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, and flaxseed, or any of them."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me call my colleague's attention to the fact that he is reading from a memorandum from the United States Department of Agriculture submitted to somebody, presumably to the Senate committee. This does not tell what the Senate actually did. This is a memorandum explaining the amendments desired by the department in submitting the bill to the Senate, but we do not know whether the Senate accepted them.

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly they accepted them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman says so now.

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill as passed by the Senate carried the amendments suggested by the department in the memorandum included in the committee report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the committee reporting this bill should tell us in what respect the existing law is changed.

Mr. HAUGEN. I can do that now, or I can explain it section by section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the bill is all in one section and when read for amendment all of the bill should be read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Clerk will conclude the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 5 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That each license issued under sections 4 and 9 of this act shall terminate as therein provided, or in accordance with the terms of this act and the regulations thereunder, and may from time to time be modified or extended by a written instrument."

That section 11 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to inspect, sample, or classify any agricultural product or products, stored or to be stored in a warehouse licensed under this act, according to condition, grade, or otherwise, and to certificate the condition, grade, or other class thereof, or to weigh the same and certificate the weight thereof, or both to inspect, sample, or classify and weigh the same and to certificate the condition, grade, or other class and the weight thereof, upon condition that such person agree to comply with and abide by the terms of this act and of the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder so far as the same relate to him."

That section 12 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That any license issued to any person to inspect, sample, or classify, or to weigh any agricultural product or products under this act may be suspended or revoked by the Secretary of Agriculture whenever he is satisfied, after opportunity afforded to the licensee concerned for a hearing, that such licensee has failed to inspect, sample, or classify, or to weigh any agricultural product or products correctly, or has violated any of the provisions of this act or of the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, so far as the same may relate to him, or that he has used his license or allowed it to be used for any improper purpose whatever. Pending investigation, the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he deems necessary, may suspend a license temporarily without hearing."

That section 15 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. That any fungible agricultural product stored for interstate or foreign commerce, or in any place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, in a warehouse licensed under this act, shall be inspected and graded by a person duly licensed to grade the same under this act."

That section 19 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, from time to time, to establish and promulgate standards for agricultural products by which their quality or value may be judged or determined: Provided, That the standards for any agricultural products which have been, or which in future may be, established by or under authority or any other act of Congress shall be, and are hereby, adopted for the purposes of this act as the official standards of the United States for the agricultural products to which they relate."

That section 29 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 29. That nothing in this act shall be construed to conflict with, or to authorize any conflict with, or in any way to impair or limit the effect or operation of the laws of any State relating to warehouses, warehousemen, weighers, graders, inspectors, samplers, or classifiers; but the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with such officials as are charged with the enforcement of such State laws in such States and through such cooperation to secure the enforcement of the provisions of this act; nor shall this act be construed so as to limit the operation of any statute of the United States relating to warehouses or warehousemen, weighers, graders, inspectors, samplers, or classifiers now in force in the District of Columbia or in any Territory or other place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States."

That section 30 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 30. That every person who shall forge, alter, counterfeit, simulate, or falsely represent, or shall without proper authority use any license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture under this act, or who shall violate or fail to comply with any provision of section 8 of this act, or who shall issue or utter a false or fraudulent receipt or certificate, or any person who, without lawful authority shall convert to his own use, or use for purposes of securing a loan, or remove from a licensed warehouse contrary to this act or the regulations promulgated thereunder, any agricultural products stored or to be stored in such warehouse and for which licensed receipts have been or are to be issued, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $10,000, or double the value of the products involved if such double value exceeds $10,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court, and the owner of the agricultural products so converted, used, or removed may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be reimbursed for the value thereof out of any fine collected hereunder, by check drawn on the Treasury at the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, for the value of such products to the extent that such owner has not otherwise been reimbursed. That any person who shall draw with intent to deceive a false sample of, or who shall willfully mutilate or falsely represent a sample drawn under this act, or who shall classify, grade, or weigh fraudulently any agricultural products stored or to be stored under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court."

With the following committee amendments:

That section 6 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That each warehouseman applying for a license to conduct a warehouse in accordance with this act shall, as a condition to the granting thereof, execute and file with the Secretary of Agriculture a good and sufficient bond to the United States to secure the faithful performance of his obligations as a warehouseman under the laws of the State, District, or Territory in which he is conducting such warehouse, as well as under the terms of this act and the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, and of such additional obligations as a warehouseman as may be assumed by him under contracts with the respective depositors of agricultural products in such warehouse. Said bond shall be in such form and amount, shall have such surety or sureties, subject to service of process in suits on the bond within the State, District, or Territory in which the warehouse is located, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe to carry out the purposes of this act, including the requirements of fire insurance. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that a bond approved by him is, or for any cause has become, insufficient, he may require an additional bond, conforming with the requirements of this section, and unless the same be given within the time fixed by a written demand therefor the license of such warehouseman may be suspended or revoked."

That section 18 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That every receipt issued for agricultural products stored in a warehouse licensed under this act shall embody within its written or printed terms (a) the location of the warehouse in which the agricultural products are stored; (b) the date of issue of the receipt; (c) the consecutive number of the receipt; (d) a statement whether the agricultural products received will be delivered to the bearer, to a specified person, or to a specified person or his order; (e) the rate of storage charges; (f) a description of the agricultural products received, showing the quantity thereof, or, in case of agricultural products customarily put up in bales or packages, a description of such bales or packages by marks, numbers, or other means of identification and the weight of such bales or packages; (g) the grade or other class of the agricultural products received and the standard or description in accordance with which such classification has been made: Provided, That such grade or other class shall be stated according to the official standard of the United States applicable to such agricultural products as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law: Provided further, That until such official standards of the United States for any agricultural product or products have been fixed and promulgated, the grade or other class thereof may be stated in accordance with any recognized standard or in accordance with such rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; (h) a statement that the receipt is issued subject to the United States warehouse act and the rules and regulations prescribed thereunder; (i) if the receipt be issued for agricultural products of which the warehouseman is owner, either solely or jointly or in common with others, the fact of such ownership; (j) a statement of the amount of advances made and of liabilities incurred for which the warehouseman claims a lien: Provided, That if the precise amount of such advances made or of such liabilities incurred be at the time of the issue of the receipt unknown to the warehouseman or his agent who issues it, a statement of the fact that advances have been made or liabilities incurred and the purpose thereof shall be sufficient; (k) such other terms and conditions within the limitations of this act as may be required by the Secretary of Agriculture; and (l) the signature of the warehouseman, which may be made by his authorized agent: Provided, That unless otherwise required by the law of the State in which the warehouse is located, when requested by the depositor of other than fungible agricultural products, a receipt omitting compliance with subdivision (g) of this section may be issued if it have plainly and conspicuously embodied in its written or printed terms a provision that such receipt is not negotiable."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendments to the committee amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAUGEN: In lieu of the first committee amendment, page 2, after line 11, insert:

"That section 6 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 6. That each warehouseman applying for a license to conduct a warehouse in accordance with this act shall, as a condition to the granting thereof, execute and file with the Secretary of Agriculture a good and sufficient bond to the United States to secure the faithful performance of his obligations as a warehouseman under the laws of the State, District, or Territory in which he is conducting such warehouse, as well as under the terms of this act and the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, and of such additional obligations as a warehouseman as may be assumed by him under contracts with the respective depositors of agricultural products in such warehouse. Said bond shall be in such form and amount, shall have such surety or sureties, subject to service of process in suits on the bond within the State, District, or Territory in which the warehouse is located, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe to carry out the purposes of this act, and may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, include the requirement of fire insurance. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that a bond approved by him is, or for any cause has become, insufficient, he may require an additional bond or bonds to be given by the warehouseman concerned, conforming with the requirements of this section, and unless the same be given within the time fixed by a written demand therefor the license of such warehouseman may be suspended or revoked.'"

In lieu of the second committee amendment, page 5, after line 2, insert:

That section 18 of the United States warehouse act, approved August 11, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That every receipt issued for agricultural products stored in a warehouse licensed under this act shall embody within its written or printed terms (a) the location of the warehouse in which the agricultural products are stored; (b) the date of issue of the receipt; (c) the consecutive number of the receipt; (d) a statement whether the agricultural products received will be delivered to the bearer, to a specified person, or to a specified person or his order; (e) the rate of storage charges; (f) a description of the agricultural products received, showing the quantity thereof, or, in case of agricultural products customarily put up in bales or packages, a description of such bales or packages by marks, numbers, or other means of identification and the weight of such bales or packages; (g) the grade or other class of the agricultural products received and the standard or description in accordance with which such classification has been made: Provided, That such grade or other class shall be stated according to the official standard of the United States applicable to such agricultural products as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law: Provided further, That until such official standards of the United States for any agricultural product or products have been fixed and promulgated, the grade or other class thereof may be stated in accordance with any recognized standard or in accordance with such rules and regulations not inconsistent herewith as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; (h) a statement that the receipt is issued subject to the United States warehouse act and the rules and regulations prescribed thereunder; (i) if the receipt be issued for agricultural products of which the warehouseman is owner, either solely or jointly or in common with others, the fact of such ownership; (j) a statement of the amount of advances made and of liabilities incurred for which the warehouseman claims a lien: Provided, That if the precise amount of such advances made or of such liabilities incurred be at the time of the issue of the receipt unknown to the warehouseman or his agent who issues it, a statement of the fact that advances have been made or liabilities incurred and the purpose thereof shall be sufficient; (k) such other terms and conditions within the limitations of this act as may be required by the Secretary of Agriculture; and (l) the signature of the warehouseman, which may be made by his authorized agent: Provided, That unless otherwise required by the law of the State in which the warehouse is located when requested by the depositor of other than fungible agricultural products, a receipt omitting compliance with subdivision (g) of this section may be issued: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, require that such receipt have plainly and conspicuously embodied in its written or printed terms a provision that such receipt is not negotiable."

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, if I may first take up the committee amendment, I desire to read the committee amendment and the present law:

Said bond shall be in such form and amount, shall have such surety or sureties, subject to service of process in suits on the bonds within the States, District, or Territory in which the warehouse is located, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may subscribe to carry out the purposes of this act, including the requirement of fire insurance.

That is the committee amendment. The amendment which I offered to that amendment strikes out the word "including" and inserts in lieu of it the words "and may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, include," so that in the discretion of the Secretary insurance may be required, not making it mandatory upon the warehouseman, but leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman think it could be held that the other terms and conditions that the Secretary may prescribe would not be within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is possible that it might. But the purpose is to make it clear. A good many think that the warehouseman should be required to provide for insurance. This would leave it to the discretion of the Secretary. If in his opinion the warehouseman is responsible, he may not require insurance.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is the only difference between the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa and the committee amendment to section 6?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the change in existing law in the committee amendment to section 6?

Mr. HAUGEN. If the provision in the act referred to by the gentleman included insurance there would not be any change, but to make it clear that the Secretary has the power to require insurance in case it is needed, the Secretary is given authority to require insurance.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So that the provision with reference to fire insurance is the only change in section 6 proposed by the committee or by the gentleman's substitute for the committee amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly. As reported by the committee it made it mandatory, and as provided in the amendment which I offer it leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary as to insurance.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, if he does not object to answering the question at this time, a question in respect to section 30.

Mr. HAUGEN. I would prefer to have the first amendment cleared up.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My attention was first directed to this bill when it was called up on the floor. I have read the report, and I am trying to find out just what change is made in existing law, not with a good deal of success. At the hearings were the various elevator companies represented? Were they present in any way?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am quite sure that the elevator men have not much interest in the bill one way or the other. The ordinary course was pursued. The hearings were open to everyone who cared to appear. The bill has been in the Senate for a long time. It has been before the House committee, and everybody who cared to had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has not heard of any opposition whatever coming from elevator men?

Mr. HAUGEN. None whatever.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Or warehousemen?

Mr. HAUGEN. Nothing at all. Minnesota has not a single licensed warehouse.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This is the first time I ever knew that there was a Federal licensed warehouse.

Mr. HILL. Apparently Maryland has none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Iowa has three and Kansas had a number a few years ago, but they were withdrawn.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. That law does not make it compulsory.

Mr. HAUGEN. Not at all.

Mr. ASWELL. In the original act, section 6, the requirement for insurance was in the act. In the appropriation of 1920 it was stricken out. The committee first restored it, and there was some question which came up to us from the depositors in the warehouse from all over the country, and after extended hearings, hearing those opposed and those in favor, this final decision of leaving it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture was agreed on as the most harmonious compromise.

Mr. HAUGEN. That seems to meet the approval of everybody.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Just what was the purpose of the enactment of the United States warehouse act?

Mr. HAUGEN. It was enacted in 1916. The Committee on Agriculture gave the matter considerable thought and consideration. It was to permit warehousemen to take out a license under the Federal Government.

Mr. ASWELL. To borrow money.

Mr. HAUGEN. So as to deposit products in a license warehouse and receive a receipt and if desired to borrow money on the receipt to make the receipt more secure to the money lender as well as to the one who deposits the agricultural product.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. To provide for increasing and regulating the terminal warehouses.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not think it was aimed at the terminal warehouses. It is intended more for the South, for the storage of cotton.

Mr. ASWELL. Fungible products.

Mr. HILL. The act says——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. The act which was approved in 1916 says:

The term agricultural products wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, and flaxseed, or any of them.

Now, does this amendment extend this to other agricultural products?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly; that is what it does.

Mr. HILL. Another question along the general line of the bill. There is an amendment to section 30. Now, section 30 in the original act is the penal section?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. And it provides that any violation of the act shall be a misdemeanor, and there will be a maximum fine of $500 or imprisonment not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court. The proposed amendment to section 30, as contained on pages 8 and 9 of the pending bill, apparently raises the maximum fine to $10,000, or double the value of the products involved if such double value exceeds $10,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, and then it apparently adds a new type of offense on page 9—

That any person who shall draw with intent to deceive a false sample of, or who shall willingly mutilate or falsely represent a sample drawn under this act, or who shall classify, grade, or weigh fraudulently any agricultural product stored or to be stored under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof fined not more than $500 or imprisoned for not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this changes the language of the act of 1916 as to penalties or not. It seems to me to be a very radical change.

Mr. HAUGEN. They are more severe.

Mr. HILL. I would like to say to the chairman I have had no communication from any of my constituents about this, although Baltimore is a big tobacco and grain-storage city. I am asking purely for information. It seems to me there is a very drastic increase of Federal penalties here.

Mr. ASWELL. Are there any Federal warehouses in Baltimore?

Mr. HILL. Apparently not. I read the report of the committee, and I understand there are no Federal warehouses in Maryland under this type.

Mr. HAUGEN. The act is for the more special benefit of the cotton districts in the South.

Mr. HILL. How would it affect tobacco?

Mr. HAUGEN. So they not only can deposit tobacco in a licensed warehouse, safeguarded by a bond and by insurance and all the safeguards necessary to secure the money of the lender and depositor.

Mr. HILL. One further question. On page 9 there is a provision that the Secretary of Agriculture shall reimburse anyone by check for any theft from the warehouse. That only means that he can reimburse in case the person convicted pays the fine. Is that right?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. That is really a form of Government-controlled warehouse, is it not?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. A moment ago I called the attention of the gentleman to the amendment of section 2. As I understand it, the only change there is the designation that defines what is an agricultural product?

Mr. HAUGEN. Let me read the section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is the only change.

Mr. HAUGEN (reading)—

The term "agricultural product" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to mean cotton, wool, grain, tobacco, flaxseed, or any of them.

We strike out those words, the limitation, and provide "in which any agricultural product is or may be stored."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], for whose opinion on this matter I have very high regard, said that meant only fungible agricultural products. Now, where in the law does it state otherwise?

Mr. ASWELL. It says on fungible products.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That leads me to this question: Would all kinds of agricultural products be subject to storage in one of these warehouses if you take this definition out?
